The Troians beleeved that while their Palladium or the image of Minerus was kept in Troy, the Citie should neuer bee ouerturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladine carrie into the field, as they were made beleeue, 50 the very Crosse whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Chrisostome vpon Saint Matthew ( if that bee his worke) giueth a good judgement, speaking of those that ware a part of Saint Johns Gospell about their neckes, for an amulet or preservative. auribus quomo so proderunt in Collo? If those words doe not profit men in their cares ( to wit, the hearing of the Gospell preached ) how should it prosit them by hanging it a- * best their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Croffe, but the reverence of the Father that gave the one for a memorie of his Covenant : and the Faith in his Sonne, which flied his blood on the other for redemptition, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philiftims returning with the greatest victorie and gloric which ever they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and fet it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from about to the 10 ground, and lay vider the Arke. The morning following they tooke it vp, and fet it vp, and fet it againe in his place. And it fell the fecond time, and the head brake from the bodie, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason, and knowledge, and the hands (by which wee execute strength) were fundred from the armes. For God and the Deuillinhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not indure the representation of the true God, it is not to be maruailed, that at fuch time as it pleafed him to couer his onely begotten with flesh, and fent him into the world, that all the Oracles wherein the Diuell derided and betrayed mortall men lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that true light which had never beginning of brightnesse, brake through the clouds of a virgins bodie, thining vpon the earth which had beene leng obscured by Idolatrie, all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great God Pan, as hee stileth him; where (as ignorant of the true cause) he searcheth his braines for many reasons of fo great an alteration : yet finds he none out but friuolous. For not onely this olde Deuill did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Inpiter, Diana, and the whole rable became speachlesse.

Now while the Philistums triumphed after this victorie, God strook them with the grieuous disease of the Hemorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers For 30 it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered that the Arke should be removed from Azotus to Gath or Gethanother of the five great Cities of the Philiftims; to prove, as it feemeth whether this difeafe were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grieuous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and hee (mote the men of the Citie both (mall and great, cre. And being not yet fatisfied, they of Gath lent the Arke to Ekron or Accaron, a third Citic of the Philifims : but they also felt the fame fmart, and cryed out that themselves and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by 40 the adulfe of their Priefts, the Prince of the Philiftims did not onely resolue to return the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Ifrael, remembring the plagues which had fallen on the Agyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his feruice by strong hand. Wherefore confelling the power of the God of Ifrael to bee almightie, and that their owne Idols were subject thereunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vling these words; so yee shall give glorie to the God of Israel that hee may take his hand from you, and from your c.b.v.s. Gods and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemie doth approue our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. Hese Tragedies ouerpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while hee was yet a childe, became now Inege and Gouernour of Isla-el. He was descended of the samilie of b Chore or Korach. For Leu 30 had three sonnes 3Gerson, Chesth, and Merari: Chesth had Amram, and Izaar : of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore : and of

V T when age now beganne to ouer-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to under-goe the burthen of fo carefull a gouernment, he put off from himfelfe the waight of the affaires on his Sonnes, loel and Abyah, who judged the people at Beersheba, a Citic, the very vtmost towards the South of Indea. And as the place was inconvenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the instice and vertue of their Father. For the thirst of couctousnesse the more it Evalloweth, the more it drieth, and defireth, finding tast in nothing but gaine; to recouer which they did fet the Law at a price, and fold Iustice and judgment to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Ifrael Obscrued, and saw that Samuel as a natural man (though a Prophet) could not fo well differne the errours of his owne, they praied him to confent to their change of gouernment, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable succession which followed the rule of Eli his fonnes, when those of Samuel by their first bloffomes promifed to yeeld fruit no leffe bitter, they faw no way to put the gouernement from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choise of a

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from 10 God: which furely he did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appeares by the Text, this speech or motion dispieating him, hee yield his best arguments to dehort them : which when he perceived to bee over-feeble, hee delivered vnto them from Gods reuclation, the inconveniences and miferies which should befall them. And yet, all which he fore-shewed was not intollerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is fo still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will vie their fonnes in his owne feruice to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not only not grieuous, but by the vaffalls of all Kings according to their birth and condition defired: it be- 20 ing very agreeable to Subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres; and to till the ground no leffe proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned: Hewill take up your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Oline trees, and give them to his feruants; with other oppressions; this hath given, and gives daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne diferetion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwife, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Soner agnes 20 hand. The former opinion is grounded first upon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of gouernment from Judges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many thinges vnto the Kings, as many wives, conetoufnesse, and the like:he commandeth that the Kings which were to raigne ouer I/rael, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written; and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all daies of his life: that he may learne to scare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the wordes of this Law, and thefe ordinances for to doe them : that he may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, fay they, is contrarie to the lawes of God: in the same booke written. For it is said, That which 40 is inst and right shalt thou follow, that thou maiest line. Now if it bee not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eate out of an other mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much leffe lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the ow-Deut. 23. v.24. ner, and give it to an other. Neither are the wordes of the Text (fay they) fuch as doe warrant the Kings of Ifrael, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not faid that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your Sonnes:

and againe, this shall be the manner of the King that shall raigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power seuered from pietic, (because it is accountable to money which he refused : yet because he was falsly accused and vniustly condemned (though by colour of law) how gricuously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of I/rael. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, cuen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe. Posuisti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true. Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata aquitas non est aquitas : sed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Fained innocence. and tained equitie are neither the one nor the other; but the fault or offence is there doubled to in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation who thinke this place to containe the description of a T yrant. But the arguments on the contrarie fide, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true law of free Monarchies, which Treatife I may not prefume to abridge, much leffe here to infert. Only thus much I will fay, that if practife doe shew the greatnesse of authoritie, even the best Kings of Juda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did what soeuer they pleased in the greatest thinges; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne bretheren to be flaine without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Friah, yet Salomon killing his elder brother and others, the fame was not imputed vnto him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not only fore-told by Moles in Deuteronomie, but prophecied of by Iacob in this Scripture. The Gen. 190 Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a Gen. 15. bleffing. For it was not only affured that his iffues should in number equal the Starres in heaven, but that Kings should proceede of him. Which state seeing it is framed from the Patterne of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall : and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other gouernments, hath beene by many judicious men handled and proued, I shall not neede to ouer-paint that which is gar-20 nished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Iudges every man hath observed what civill Warre Israel had: what outragious flaughters they committed upon each other: in what miferable feruitude they lived for many yeares; and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Iordan: the Philistims the Sea-coasts: and the Iebusites Hierus alem it selfe, till Davids time: all which that King did not only conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subjected all the Neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vaffalls. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by 40 those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to live vnder a Monarch, or whether by this meanes they fought to be cleared from the fonnes of Samuel, they be- T. (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promifes) and Saul also hauing wandred diners daies to seeke his Fathers Asses, at length by the aduise of his Servant travailed towards Ramath, to finde out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beafts. In which journey it pleafed God (who doth many times order the greatest thinges by the simplest passages and perfons) to elect Saul, who fought an Affe, and not a Kingdome : like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of Jethro; and after to make choise of Danist the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beaits, and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making to him of all other the most victorious King of Inda and Ifrael. So Iohn and Iacob were taken from casting their nets, to become Fishers of men, and honoured with thetitles of Apoliles, a dignitic that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours doe:

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staid his arrivall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom he had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Ifrael, much leffe knowing the Honour which attended him: asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt, 20 Samuel answered that himselfe was the man he sought, and praied Saul to go before him to the high place, where Samuel fetting him according to his degree, aboue all that were inuited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Ifrael.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two men should incounter him by Rahels Sepulcher, who should tell him that his Asses were found; and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of loofing his beafts, to doubt the losse of his some: that he should then meete three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a companie of Prophets; and that he should be partaker 30 of Gods spirit and prophecie with them : and that thereby his condition and dispofition should be changed from the vulgar into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spiritual gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by dinine reuelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errours of their Kings, and wrought mira-Chrysia plat 43. cles; of which number were Aloses, tofua, Samuel and after them Gad, Nathan, Alnus, The Prim Elist, Elifeus, Ifay, Ieremic, and the rest; for these Prophets saith S. But the pretions flores cashing of lots was not only much ysed among the terres, but by many others, if not 50 rating or fors was not only much yield among the letters, but by many others, if not made by the by all Nations. The Land of promife was diuided by lot: God commanded lots to Artificers, See be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a sigure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. The lot is rast into the lap, but the whole diffosition is of the Lord. And in like fort fell the Kingdome of Ifrael on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election : from which election Saul with-drew himselfe in modestie, as both Insephus consters it, and as it may be gathered by his former answeres to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe to the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Israel, whereupon all the multitude faluted him King, and praied for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him prefents as the manner was : of whom Saul, to avoide fedition, 1. ## Of the establishing of SAVL by his first victories.

O sooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee received knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to beliege knowledge that Nama King of the Cammonies prepared to beinge falses Gilead: which Nation lince the great ouer-throw given them by Iephra, neuer durft attempt any thing you the Ifraelites, till the beginning of Saud his rule. And although the Anymonites did alwaies attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorite, and then Ifrael disposses them of which they made the ground of their innalion in Iephta's time; yet they neuer perswaded themselves of more advantage 30 than at this present. For first they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly fubmit themselves to this new King: secondly they were remembred that the Philistims had not long before flaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and belides had yfed great care and pollicie that they should have no Smithes to make them fwords or speares: neither was it long before that of the Bethfremesites and places adioyning, there perilhed by the hand of God more then 50000, and therefore in these respects, even occasion it selfe invited them to inlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the nearest. Besides it may further be coniectured that the Ammonites were imboldened against tabes Gilead, in respect of their weakenesse, since the Israelites destroied a great part of them, for not 14d.271 40 joyning with them against the Beniamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likely to have beene increased to any great numbers: And if they had recovered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel having for long time been difarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroied. But contrariewise when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransome themselves, but by pulling out their right eies, by which they should be vtterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath beene spoken: Saul, both to valew 50 himselfe in his first yeares raigne, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Beniamites, gave order to affemble the forces of Ifrael: hewing a yoke of Oxen into peeces, and fending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, protesting thus. by their goodes, and not by their lives at the first. Seven daies had Saul to affect ble an Armic, by reason that the Gileacites had obtained the respite of these seuen daies to give Nahas the Ammonite an answere : who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel. and to Eccome Vallalls and T ributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul affembled the forces, which repaired vnto him at Bezee, neare Iordan, that he might readily passethe River; which done he might in one day with a speedy march arriue at labes, under the Hills of Gilead.

The Armie by Saul led confifting of three hundreth and thirtie thousand; hereturned an answere to those of Jabes, that they should assure themselves of succour to by the next day at noone. For as it feemeth S.ul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch hee surprized the Armie of Namas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might fet on them on all lides, he divided his force in three parts, putting them to the fivord, untill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of sauls troupes, inforst them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonies were become the more careleffe and fecure, in that those of Jabes promifed the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happy fuccesse the people were so farre in love with their new King, that they would have flaine all those that it murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and refisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly 20 men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despiglitfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misaduenture, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe,

I,Sam.12.

After the Armieremoued, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the affembly, containing precepts, and a rehearfall of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now raigned one yeare before hee was established in Gigal or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he affigned 1000 to attend on Ionathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citic of his 30 natiuitie: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas; and in the Hill of

Of SAVLS disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philipims and Amalekites, which caused his fi-

ONATHAN with his finall Armie or Regiment, that attended him, 40 taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philislims: the fame, as fome thinke, which Stul paft by, when he came from Rams where he was first annotined by Simuel, which they thinke to have beene Cariath-testim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrifon 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-iewim: but Linius vinderstands this Garrison to have beene at Gebah in Beniamin neare Gibha where Ionathan abode with his thousand followers. How socuer by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Ifrael: and now being greatly inraged by this surprize they affembled 30000. armed Chariots, and 6000. Horse, where-with they inuaded in-50 des, and incampedat Machinis or Michinis, a Citic of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierufalem, and in the midst of the Land betweene the Sea and Iordan. With this fuddaine inuation the Ifraelites were strucken in so great a feare, as fome of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountaines, other fled over Iordan into Gall and Gilead : Saul himfelte with some 2000, men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at 6.1/gala in Beniamin, not farre from the passage of jojua when hee led I/raei ouer Iordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel seauen daies. But when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he prefumed (as fome expound the place 1.5am. (3.9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrarie to the Ecclesiasticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commaundements: others expound the word, obtalit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacer dotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to have beene any intrution into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commaundement, in not flaying according to the appointment. Secondly a diffidence or millrust in Gods helpe, & too great relying vppon the strength of the people, whose departing Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of fo godly a man might procure him. But what focuer was his finne, not with flanding his excuses, he was by Samuel re- 1.5am.c.13. prehended most sharply, in termes vnfitting his citate, had not extraordinarie warrant beene given to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe, at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart ) both from Saul and his posteritie.

from him he could not beare patiently, and lattly a Contempt of the holy Prophet

After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul when he had taken view of his armie found it to confift of 600, men; for the most were fled from him and feattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Ionathan only. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all I frael, that made weapons; besides they that came to S. w came ha- 1. Sams 3.7. filly and left fuch weapons & armour as they had, behind them in the garrifons; for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should bee able the vecre before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour labes Gilead with 330000. men, if there had not now beene any yron weapon to defend them-felues withall, faue onely in the hand of Saul and Ionathan his sonne. But how-30 focuers all the rest of the people were formerly distanced by the Philistims, and all those craftesm in carried out of the land that made weapons : there being left viito the If raelites onely illes to tharpen and amend fuch stuffe as ferued for the plough, and for nought effected that they had some kinde of armes it is manifest, or els they durst not have attempted upon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any fword in all Ifrael, but onely that there was not any found amongst those 600. Souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: 1.5am.13.22. and it feemeth that when Samuel had publiquely reprehended Saul, that his owne guards for fooke him, having but 600, remaining of his 3000, ordinarie fouldiers, and of all the reft that repaired vnto him, of which many were fled from him before

With this small troupe he held himselfe, to his owne Citic of Gibesh, as a place of more fireigth and better affured vnto him, then Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistimes should thus disarme the most part of the Ifracites, how focuer in the time of Samuel much had bin done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by fword or speare, but by thunder from heaven and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no meruaile if they could not in a short peace under Samuel bee replanted againe. For this tiranny of the Philistims is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to bee thought that by their craftes they 30 proceeded in the pollicie, not fuffering their artificers to teach the Ifraelites, and fo even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policie did Nahuchodonosor vse after his Conquest in Indea : Dyonisius in

Sicilie; and many other Princes elsewheere in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Iordan the Phili-

stims had not inuaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed, and their present necessitie ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites exceeded in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the twelfth Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour Danid against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were wesponed with bowes, and could we the right and the left handwith stones; & with a sling it was, that David himselfe slew the gyant Goliah.

While the State of Ifrael stood in these hard termes, the Philijlims having parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; ionathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may bee gathered by the successe) beeing incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though hee were discourred before he came to the hill toppe, and in a kinde of derision called vp by his enemies : yet hee so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God hee flewe twentie of the first Philistims that hee incountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, scare, and scalousie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: wherupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly Saul himselfe taking know-20

ledge of the rout and diforder, together with those Israelites that throuded themfelues in mount Ephraim, fet vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victoric oner them. Heere was that prophecie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Ionathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand,

This done, the small armie of Ifrael made retrait from the pursuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take foode till the euening, yet his fon Ionathan being infeebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a droppe of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Ionathan, seemes to have reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrowelikewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselues quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely the Moabits, Ammonits, Edomits, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he prevailed. Hee then assembled all the forces hee could make, to wit, 2 10000. men, and receiving the commaundement of God by Samuel, hee inuaded Amalee, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petras, and the defart, belonging to the Amalekits, from Haulah towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Agypt; in which warre he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he 40 was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all other attempted I/rael, when they left Agypt in Moles time : he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beastes and spoile of the Countrie, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therfore did Samuel now a second time make him know, that God would cast him from his roiall estate to which he was raised, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there bin no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how seuerely it pleased God to inione the Ifraelites to reuenge themselues vpon that Nation, he was in all vnexcusable. For 50 God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amales from under heaven. For the crueltie which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Ifraclites, especially on those which were our wearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, & his Nation about 400. yeres afterward;

and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselfe having also sinned in the same kind, as these words of S.muel witnesse: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be child 1.5am.15.33. leffe among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had bin by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pecces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see SAVL untill the day of his death.

Of the occurrents betweene the rejection of SAVI and his death.

Ow while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Ishai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a fort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how he might ausoide both the surption, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wifedome he fought to avoide the inconvenience or dangers of this life, then doe those men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, doe no o-20 therwife avoide the perills and dangers thereof than as men flupified in the opinion of fate, or destinie, neglecting either to begge counfaile at Gods hand, by praier, or to exercise that wisedome or fore-fight, where-with God hath inriched the mind of man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to avoide the furie of Sanl, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Ishai, Samuel by God directed, made choise of David, the yongest, having refused Eliab, the first borne; who though he were a man of a comly person and great firength; yet vnto fuch outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God feeth not as a man feeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. Hee 30 alforefuling theother fixe brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had 1.Sam. altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock, for of him the Lord faid to SAMVEL, arife and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samue! departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of David:in which bloudy mind he continued till he died, ouercome in battaile by the Philistims. The Philiftims having well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still and forborne to give impediment vnto his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as intelly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Ifrael might be repaied with aduantage, if euer opportunitie should serue their often iniu-40 red neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all Warlike promitions, the Philiflims had reason to thinke themselves equall, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part been agreable to their owne wilhes; as for late difafters, they might, according to humane wifedome, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse searchad fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces and taken the field, encamping so neare to the Armie which King Sanl drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battaile, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, 30 not ioyning in groffe, but maintaining some skirmillies, as refusing both of them to paffe the valley that lay between their Camps. Iust causes of seare they had on both fides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had been confounded by the angrie hand of God Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they fought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroake from heaven were to be feared. Goliah of Gath a strong giant, fearing neither God nor man, undertooke to defic the whole hofte of Ifrael, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it felfe as ouercome in groffe, and become vaffall to the other. This gaue occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publicke notice of the people. For no man durft expose himfelfe to encounter the great strength of Goliah, vntill Danid (fent by hisfather of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offenfine or defenfine than a fling, wherewith hee ouerthrewe that 10 haughtic gyant, and after with his owne fword strooke off his head. Hereuvon the Philistims, who should have yeelded themselves as subjects to the Conquerour, according to the couenant on their owne fide propounded, fled without flay; and were purfued and flaughtered even to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philiftims were not so broken, that either any of their townes were loft, or their people discouraged from infelting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom

God had wrought this victoric, fell into the grieuous indignation of his maller

Saul, through the honour purchased by his well deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, he then became uid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with the fword of his own conquest taken from Goliah; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contraof crueltie are breach of faith towards men, and impictie towards God. The former he thewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promifed him: and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had given her; also in that when as Dauid had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impictie towards God he shewed, in that he fought counfell of the witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For wheras when he fought counfel from God he had been alwaies victorious : from the Oracle of the Deuill this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with 40 his neerest and faithfullest servants, were all slaughtered by the Philislims: his bodie with the bodies of his fonnes (as a spectacle of thame and dishonour) were hung ouer the wals of Bethfan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Tabes Stolne their carcafes thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Ifrael, togither with Simuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, & Injephus. But yet it seemeth to me that after the death of Samue', Saul did not rule very long. For in the beginning of the 25 chapter, it is written Theoph. 1.3. p. 3.

Joseph. 1.28. that Samuel died; and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abiguil, after which the death of Saul quickly enfued. An exceeding valuant man he was and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adhærents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

CHAP-17. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

N the second yeare of Samuel, according to Enfebius, was David borne: after Codoman later, and in the ninth yeare : after Bunting in the tenth. For Dauid, faith he, was thirtie yeares old when he beganne to raigne: whence it followeth, that he was born in the tenth of the fortie years. which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh of Samuel Aneus Siluius the fonne of Posthumus beganne his raigne over the Latines in Alba. who gouerned that State 3 1. yeares. There are who place before him Latinus Silmins, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Aneas, and fourth King of Albs, wherof I will not stand to dispute. In the elementh of Samuel, Dercilus fate in the Throne of Asyria, being the one and thirtieth King; hee ruled that Empire 40. yeares. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraelida, who then led and commanded the Nation, possest a great part thereof 328. yeares before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratofthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the lonians, Dono rians, and Edians: at length it was called Helles, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pthiotis in The ffalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till fuch time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and fundriegreat victories obtained, the illues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie under their obedience, calling themselues generally by one name, and vecteuery severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not becamille to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

30 Ispetus (as the Pocts fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such fignification:

or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophia,

Ispetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus : of whom all men haueread that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion : and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrharaigned in Theffalie, which then was called Pyrrha (as Cretenfis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrhathe Queene. In Deucalions time was that great floud, of which we have spoken elsewhere. Deucalion begat Hellen : whose somes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Folius: of Dorus and Folius, the Dores and Folians had name. The Foles inhabited Baotia. The Dores having first inhabited fundrie parts of Thessalie, did af-40 terward feate themselves about Parnassus: and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedamon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his bretheren, for having discreted from them to his owne vie fome part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, hee begat on her two fonnes, Achaus and Ion. Of these two Achaus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponne fus: and feating him felfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as fome write) he afterwards departed; and leaving an Armie recourred the Kingdome of his grand-father in Theffalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian inuaded Attiea, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby fuch loue and honour of the people, that 50 they committed the ordering of their State into his handes. He divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Agialos, or Agadia: In which Countrie Solinas then raigning, thought it fafer to give his daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So

Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his wives name in Egialia, where he and his posteritie raigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaueto that Land the denomination. But in after-times the Dores affifting the Nephewes of Hercules, inuaded Peloponnesus, and ouer-comming the Achaens possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the zeher had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Acher driven to fecke a new feate, came vnto the lones, defiring to inhabite Agialia with them, and alleadging in vaine, that Ion and Acheus had beene brethren. When this request could not bee obtained, they fought by force to expell the lonians, which they performed; but they loft their King Tilamenes, the sonne of Orestes, in that Warre.

Thus were the lones driven out of Peloponne sus, and compelled to remove into Atties, from whence after a while they failed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any universall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the ionesinto Aia nath beene mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140 yeares after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeares after the descent of the Heracina into Peloponnesius. These Heraclida were they of whom the Kings of Sparta iffued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeares. Of their Father Her cules many strange thinges are delinered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to have beene true, others perhaps must be alegorically 20 vnderstood. But the most approued Writers this ke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alemena, who is faid to have performed these twelve great labours.

First, he slew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he slew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place. The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hart: The fourth was the taking of a wild Bore aliue, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie : The fift was the cleanling of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which hee performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: The fixt was the chaling away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: The feuenth was the fetching a Builfrom Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which 30 Diomeies King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queene of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Gerions Beeues from Gades, the golden Apples of the Helperides; and Cerberu, from hell. The Mythologicallinterpretation of these I purposely omit as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and no leffe perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules understand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his trauailes to be the twelve fignes of the Zodisc. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well assured, that the expolition cannot have more validelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elis, Pylus, OEchalia, and other Townes, being affifted by fuch as either admi- 40 red his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that he slew many Thecues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. Histrauailes through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libyous. But fure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him : for that he (bending all his indenours to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deferts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persequuted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was sonne of Sihenelus, and grandchild of Perfeus; he raigned in Mreene, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard taskes upon Hercules, who was bound to obay him 50 (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madnesse hee had committed vpon his owne Children; but as others fay, because hee was his Subject and Servant : wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for imploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perfeus, and holden in great iealousie by Euryjtheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous feruices, wherein hee was imployed, fo that hee grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wines and Concubines aboue threefcore children. These children Eurystheus would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead : but they fled vnto Ceyx King of Trachimis, and from him (for he durft not withftand Euryfiheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gaue them entertainment, but tent them ayde, wherewith they encountred Eurystheus. Iolaus the brothers sonne of Hercules, who had affisted him 10 in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heraelide. It is faid of him, that being dead, he obtained leave of Pluto to line againe till hee might revenge the injuries done by Eurystheus: whom when he had staine in battell, he died againe. It scemes to mee, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicilie, and aboad there a long time forgotten : hee came againe into Greece to affift his cofins , and afterwardes returned backe. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurystheus was slaine, they tooke Atreus the sonne of Pelops to their King : for hee was rich, mightie, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heraclada marched under Hyllas the sonne of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of bloud, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echence King of the Tegeria a people of Arcadia, who affifted Atreus, with condition 20 that if Hyllus were victor, hee should peaceably enjoy what hee challenged as his right : otherwise the Heraelida should not enter Peloponnesu in 100, yeeres. In that combat Hills was flaine, and the Heraclida compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Ariflodemies (as the best authoritie shewes, though some haue faid, that they came under the conduct of his children and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that country, as is before thewed, having expelled the Achei, over whom the iffue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurystheus four generations.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hefiod: and on the contrarie, that Luc. Accuss the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian make Hestod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it vaccertaine which of these learned Varro de imaz. fablers was first borne : but he findes that they lived together some certaine yeeres, wherein he confirmes himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Helion in Helicon.

Nen in Chron.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. yeeres before Rome built: while 30 the Siluij reigned in Alba, about a 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. b Euthimenes findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken, in the time of Acalius the sonne of Pelias, King of Theffaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the reader with the opinions, but onely to shewethe apudclem, alex. vncertaintie and disagrement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For the curiotitic of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In derision whereof Lucian faining himselfe to haue beene in hell, and to haue spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he beganne his booke with that word : who answered, That he began in that fort, 40 because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobius Senemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanepher sobris was his succession who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

CHAP. XVII. Of DAVID.

of DAVIDS estate in the time of SAVI.

HE hazards which Dauid ranne into while he was yet onely defigned King, and liuing as a prinate man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first perfonal act of fame, was his killing of Goliab in the viewe of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the sonne of Saul, that hee loued him as his owne foule: In fo much as when Saul fought to perswade his sonne, that David would affuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause, 30 Jonathan could never be perswaded, never forst, nor ever wearied from the care of Davids life, and well doing. It was not long after this fignall act of Davids, but that Saul became exceeding icalous of him, though hee were become as his houshold feruant, and his Efquire, or armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirir, was aduifed to procure fome cunning Musitian to play before him vpon the harpe; whereby it was thought that he might finde case, which came to passe accordingly. He entertained Danid for this purpose, and began to fauour him, giving him a place of Commaund among the men of warre. But the lealous tyrant foone waxed wearic of his good affections, and fought to kill David, being thereunto moued onely through enuic of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the middest of his ra-40 uing fit, at which time hee threw a speare at David that was then playing on his harpe to doc him cafe.

Cenforinus remembreth one Afelepius a Phylitian, who practifed the curing of conferience the Frenzie, by the like Mulick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from paffion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a Kinde of harmonie, Seneeain his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, how soeuer it sometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that mulicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Musitian than to the King.

Saul having failed in fuch open attempts, gave vnto David the Commandement 50 of 1000. foldiours, to confront the Philistims withall. For hee durit not trust him as before, about his person, searing his revenue. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, hee promifed him his daughter Merab to wife: but having married her to Adriel, hee gaue to Danid his younger daughter Michel, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskinnes of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation, that the Philiftims would take Danids head than he their foreskinnes. This hope failing, when as now Davids victories begat new feares and icalouties in S. al, hee practifed with Ionathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this hee fought to murther him in his owne house, but Michol his wife delivered him. So Dauid fought Samuel at Ramah, and being purfued by Saul, fled thence vinto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimilech, then to Achie the Philylim, Prince of Geth : where to obscure himselse, he was forc't to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill affured among the Philishims he couered himselfe in the Caue of Adullam: and after conveying such of his kinsfolkes as were not fit to follow him into Aleab, 10 he hid himselfe in the desarts of Ziph, Maon, and the hilles of Engaddi, where hee cut off the lap of Sauls garments, and spared his life : as he did a second time in the defart of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the hatred, with which his master Saul was knowne to profecute him.

Of Achis David obtained *Siklag in Simeon, pretending to invade Indaa : but hee bent his forces another way and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Ilrae', letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis suppoting that Pauld had drawne bloud of his owne Nation, thought himfelfe affured of him : and therefore preparing to inuade Ifrael, fummoneth Danid to affift him, who diffembling his 29 intent, feemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company; and therefore hee withdrew him Celfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wines with the wines and children of his people taken by the Antalekites: Hereuupon his fellowes mutined, but God gaue him comfort, and affurance to recourrall againe which he did.

This armie of the Philistims commaunded by Achis, encountred Sanlat Gilborin which hee and his three sonnes were slaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to David at Siklag, in his returns from being victorious over atmalech, by a man of the same Nation, who anowed (though falfly) that himfelfe 30 at Sauls request had flaine him. David, because hee had accused himselfe, made no fcruple to cause him to be slaine at the instant; and the sooner, because the probabilities gaue strong cuidence withall. Otherwife it followeth not that euery man ought to bee believed of himselfe to his owne prejudice. For it is held in the lawe; In F. dequell. Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nist approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an euidence of the crime, vnleffe some other proofe informe the conscience of the Judge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Judge by examination may know to bee impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodisreorum l. siconsessus, et incap. de panis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Glosse reconcile these two pla- 40 ces in this fort. Si quis iniudicio sponte de seipso consiteatur, & possicamaneat in consessione, id est satis. If any man in judgement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perfeuere in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul it is not improbable, for death cutteth afunder all competition and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Ifrael also fell, could not but stirre vp forrow and moue compassion in the heart of David.

The victoric which the Philistims had gotten was so great, that some townes of the Ifraelites, euen beyond the river of Iordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemie, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may feeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious 50 as were the Philiftims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and feeke to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seemes, that the Civill warre immediatly breaking out betweene Dauid and the house of Sanl, wherein Inda was divided from the rest of Israe!, gaue them hope of an easie victorie oner both; and thereby caufed them to attempt nothing at the present, least by so doing they should inforce their difagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should confume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquithed, would become a prey to the violence of fuch as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

of the beginning of DAVIDS reigne, and the grarre made by ABNER for ISBOSETH.

Fter the death of Saul, Abner, who commaunded for Saul in the war. fought to advance Isbofeth ( or Ieboftus according to Iofephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdome of Ifrael: for Mephibofeth the first fonne of Ionathan lived. Against this Abner, and Ishofeth, David made a defensive warre, till Abner past Iordan, and entred the border of Iu-da: at which time hee fent Ioab with fuch forces as hee had, to relist Abner: Isbofeth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountred each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrel by the hands an of a few; like to that Combat betweene the Lacedamonians, and the Argines, remembred by Herodotius, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Heratif and Curiatif for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliah the Philistim made, whom David slew: a custome very auncient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his owne person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this warre of David with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there survived not any one to challenge the victoric. But the quarrell staid not here: for the armie of Iuda prest Abner go in groffe, and brake him. Three hundrethand fixtic men of Abners companions were flaine, and but twentie of Iuda; whereof Afahel the brother of Ioab was one: who when hee would needes purfue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not a sent a be moved to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounding him to death, with the stroake of his speare. For though Ashel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as Iofephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame, if he could have maistered Abner (who as Afahel perswaded himselfe, had by being o- Eciles. uerthrowne and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the race is not to the hvift.

That this civill warre lasted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made Versite. probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceine that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboleth after this, and till fuch time as there grew iealoufie betweene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

hard for mee. In this fort David complained after Abners death, and to make it cleare 14 that hee hated this fact of loab, hee followed him with this publicke imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of IOAB, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subiest to vicer; to the leprose, to lamenesse, to the sword, and to powertie, &c. For could any thing have withflood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Ioab might greatly have indangered Davids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischaunce therefore David openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceived him to bee innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to give them great respect, as hath bene alreadie shewed more at large. This office toab held in the armie of Inda, & thought 12 him felfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Danie in kinred, and had beene partaker of all his aduerlitie; wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemie should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature fo icalous of his dignitic and place, that hee afterward flew Amasa, his owne kinsman and the Kings, vpon the fame quarrell; taking it in high diffaine to fee him joyned with him leite as captaine of the hofte of Inda; much leffe could bee brooke a superiour, and such a one as had flaine his brother, and beene beaten himselfe in battell. But howfocuer Ioab did hate or delpife Abner, Danid effected highly of him as ofa Prince, and a great man in ifrael, exculing the overlight by which hee might feeme 36 to have perified, by affirming that hee died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as a man talleth be, overwicked men, fo (faid hee) diddeft thou fall. And certainly it is no errour of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyeth vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all vnder the Sunne are subject to worldly miseries and misaduentures. Howsocuer 1/2 boleth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, hee despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all I/rael were possess with great feare: insomuch as two of Isboleths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Isboleth,

There are who expound this place other wife. Except then take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebulites: others, that it had reference to the Couchant made long before with Isaa and Isaab: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wreftling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is till that Couenant) be broken Danidought not to moleft them. But for my felte I take it with 10/ephus, that they

10 armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorne of Danids attempt. For they that had held their Citic about 400. yeres against aithe Children of Ifrael, Jofua, the Inages, and Saul: did not doubt but to defend it also against David.

When he had now poffett himfelfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatoric Embaffadours & prefents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines & maried moe wives, by whom he had ten fons in Ierufalem, and by his former wives he had fix in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeres. The Philifims hearing that Danid was now anointed king as wel of Itals as of Ifrael, they thought to try him in the beginning, before hee was fully warme in his feat. And being encountred by Danid at two feuerall times in the Falley of Rephaim, or of 2. Same 20 the Gimts, they were at both times overthrowne. After which hee called the place

Then Danie affembled 30000 choice Ifraelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house of Abracadab in Gibea, to the Citie of David, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Vazah the fonne of Aminadah, whom the Lord flewe for prefuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to flay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnitie brought into the Citie with facrifices, mulicke, dances, and all fignes of joyfulneffe, in which Danid himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne. That hee was uncovered as a 30 foole in the eyes of the maidens his feruants; namely that hee forgat his regall dignitic both in apparrell and behauiour; and mixed himfelfe among the base multitude. dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and itreete's : not that the diffiked Davids behaniour (as I take it ) though the made it the colour of her derifion. But rather the aboundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glorie of her hufband to whom thee was delinered laftly by force, and remembring the miferable end ofher father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the some of Illui had built this his greatnesse, together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced fince his postession of Jerusalem, made her breake out in those despitfull tearmes, for which she aemained barren to her death.

40 This done, Dauid confulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of Ged: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had fined bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest, homicide; having threatned, not in vaine, that hee would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beaft. The warres which David had made were just, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church : yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly those Princes deceine themselves, who thinke by bloudfhed and terrour of their warres, to make themselves in greatnes like to the Almigh. tie, which is a damnable pride, not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or 30 feeke the bleffednesse promised by our Saniour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Danids founding, yet was his religious intent to well accepted, that hereupon hee received both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happie promife of the euerlasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

The cuerthrow of the Philistims and Monbites.

2.Sam.8.v.t.

Ooneafter this Danid ouerthrew the Philiflims, which made them altogether powerleffe, and vnable to make any inuation upon I fract in haste. For it is written, accepit franum Amgaris emanu Philisha orum: which place our English Geneua converts in these words. And DAVID tookethe bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philiflims. The latine of Jumus giveth another and a better fense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Genena hath it in the marginal note. This 10 Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cafaria, set on the frontier of Palastina at the entrance into Indea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retrait in all their invasions, which being taken by Deuid and demolished, there was left no such frontier towns of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hil whereon Geth or Gath flood the Hebrewes cal Amme. Lanius in 8.c. of whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first books, and the second of thirteenth Chap. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Circo.

There was no nation bordering the Tenes that fo greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any wea- 20 pon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities & villages of that kind, but inforst them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoeuer they needed; fo as the Ifraelites till this time of David were feldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

After this he gaue them foure other overthrowes: but the war of the Meabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Isbi-lenol, the head of whose speare weighed 300. Shickles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abifbai fuccoured David and flew the Philifim, 2. Samistive 17. whereupon the Councellors and Captaines of David (least the light of Ifrael might by his loffe be quenched) vowed that he should not thencefoorth hazard himselfin 30 any battaile. The fecond and third incounter and ouerthrow of the Philiftims was at Gob a place neere Gefar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, hee inuaded Meab, from whom notwithstanding in his advertitie he fought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not kowne.

The Rabines faine that Most flew those kins folkes of David, which lived under his protection in Sauls time, but question lesse Dauid welknew how that Nation had bin alwaies enemics to Israel and tooke all the occasions to vexe them that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23. of Deuter. God commaunded Israel not to feeke the peace or prosperitie of the Mosbus, which David well observed, for he de-40 stroyed two parts of all the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his armic by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the sonne of Rehob King therof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy land: to which I referre the Reader.

The warre which DAVID made upon the Syrians.

T is written in the Text:D AVID (mote also HADADEZER &c. as hee 50 went to recouer his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he wen to to recover his border) be referred to David or Hadadezerit is not agreed upon. Innius thinkes that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Tohu opprest by Hadadezer, ouer-threw the one and succoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion. that this recourse hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if Danid had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates he was in farre better case to have proceeded after his victorie than before : feeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemie on his back, either to purfue him, to take victuals and fupplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Againe, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army conlilling of footmen, for the most, if not all : Hee had now both horse and chariots good store to cary his prouisions through those yo vicultived places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Euphrates or any part therof. But we find that David returned to Hierusalem, after hee had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian armie, not bending his courfe towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases alreadie made. Wherby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King Dauid, that was going to inlarge his

The king of Syria Damascena, and of Damascus, wherof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrowne by the Ifraelits, fearing his owne offate, & the loffe of his owne Contry which adioyned to Spria Zobah of Hadadezer, fent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour : but these, as it apeareth, came too late for 20 Adadezer, and too sonne for themselves : for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damafeus, Tofephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name & family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Affyrians, as is showed heretofore. Dauid having now reduced Damajous vnder his obedience, left a garrifon therin, as he did in Edom: having also fackt the adiovning cities of Betah, and Berati, belonging to Aladezer, of which Cities Piolomy calleth Betah, Tauba: & Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi whose contry of Hamathioined to Adadezer (as in the description of the Holy land the reader may perceine) sent his son Ioram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he 30 had war with Adadezer, and partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, filuer, and brasse, all which together with the golden sheilds of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoiles of other Nations Danid dedicated vnto God at his returne. Iunius translated the words (dypeos aureos) by ombones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the boffes only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of braffe in place of these of Adadezer, at such time as Shiesb the Agyptian fackt the Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby, that those of Adadezer were

This done David fent Embassadours to Hanam King of the Ammonites to con-40 gratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David in the time of his affliction under Saul, had beene relieued by Nahafh, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill aduifed, and ouer-icalous of his effate, vfed Dauids meffengers so barbaroully, and contemptuoully (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments ) as hee thereby drewe a warre vppon himfelfe, which neither his owne flrength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand souldiers of the Amalakites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vaffalles of Adadezer twentie thou- Manchabethe fand, and of Machab and Ishtob thirteene thousand ( for which hee disbursed North part of a thousand talents of filuer) yet all these great armies together with the strength membred in 50 of the Animonites, were by Ioab and his brother Abifhai eafily broken and put to Denta 1. I flat or Theb ruine: and that without any great losseor flaughter at that time. And it is write accounty neer ten that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retraited into their Cities, Gad under the the one holding themselves within the wals, the other in their desarts adiopning, tockes of Ar. till loab was returned to Hierufalem.

and sent for all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side Helan or the thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, affembled all the ablest men of Ifrael lam which the and marched towardes the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; long calleth de to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damaseus, towards the Northeast, than Hierulalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence go on towards Euphrates ( which was the farthest-off journey that ever he made because he was now Lord of Damaseus, which lay in the mid-* Sec 5.18.5 2. way. He also possess himselfe of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward 10 ilrongly fortified, and this Citie was but one daies iourney from Helam, and the riuer Euphrates. So had he two fafe retraites the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damaseus. In this incounter between David & the Syrians, they lost 40000 horsemen, and 700 chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000 fouldiers footmen and so Iunius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Israel confisting of footmen, could hardly have flaughtered 40000 horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on soote. So are the chariots taken in this battel, numbred at 7000 in the first of Chron, the o. in which number, as I conceine, all the fouldiers that ferued in them with the conductors are included : fo as there died of the Syrians in this warre against David, be-20 fore he fore't them to tribute; 1 00000 footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and belides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabba. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Inda often but the kings of Ifrael they impourished euen to the last end of that State.

Hadadezer hearing that loab had difinified his armic, affembled his forces againe, Danid having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He fent out Ivab the Lieutenant of his armies to forradge and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Ifraclites mastered and possest. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with pretious stones, Danid set on his owne head, and carri- 30 ed away with him, the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Hierufalem, following the warre of Friab-his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitie and readie to be entred : yet Iosb in honour of David forbare the last affault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arrivall. To the people he vsed extreeme rigor (if we may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters) for some of them he tare with harrowes some he sawed as under, others he cast into burning kils, in which he baked tile and bricke.

And, that which could no leffe displease God than the rest, hee was content that manvothers of his best servants and souldiers should perish together with Frich, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent against him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-downe forrowes began againe to spring; and those perils which he had pulled up by the rootes (as he hoped) gaue him an after-haruest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God

10 to take the witnesse of Danids owne mouth against him, as Danid himselfe did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have flaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne errour; in the person of another, to wit of him that tooke the poore mans sheepe that had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the lining Lord, that fuch a one shold die the death. Two yeeres after which soule and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the feast of his sheep-shearing; not perchance in reuenge of Thamars rauishment alone: but having it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any fort be assured of Ammon, he thought his affaire greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having rauished his owne fifter, and then despised her; the other after 20 a long diffembled malice, first, made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him; which done he fled away, and lived vnder the favegard of Talmai King of Geffur, necre Damsfeus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. 2. Sam. 173 Thirdly, when Absalom by the invention of Ioab, (but chiefly because of the great affection of Daniel towards his fonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, and then to his presence. He began instantly to practise against Danid his father, seeking by the pretence of common instice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vnto himfelfe a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids finne.

The company which Absalom gathered at the first were but 200. men: which 2.Sam.15. he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron; pretending, though impiously, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be fet upon on the fuddain, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surprise: but incamped in the fields, & defarts with some 600.0f his gards, and few else. And now when treason was in fallion, Ziba also sought to betray his maister Mephiloseth the sonne of Ionathan : And Shimei of the house of saul (the fire of whose hatred Dauids prosperitie had smothered, but his aduersitie illightened) holding himfelfe vpon the advantage of a mountaine fide, cast stones at Dauid, and most despightfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no pri-2.Sam.16. uate reuenges, forbadde Abilbat to purfue him for the prefent, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his fonne Salomon. Absalom being now posselt of Hierufalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Ifrael might affure themselues, that hee was irreconciliable to his father: whereof being perswaded they would then resolvedly adhere to Absalom and his cause, without seare of being given vp vpon a reconciliation betweene 3.Sam.17. them. bour, and hee shall ye with thy wines in the fight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all I fract, and before the Sunne. Hee also gave aduise to Absalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000, men might be imployed at the infrant for the furprizing of Daniel, which had willingly beene imbraced by Absalom. 3.5am.17.v.14 had not Husbai Danids faithfull scruant given counter-aduise, and swayed it : perswading Abfalom, that it was fitter and more fafe for him with all the strength of Ifrael, 20 to purfue his father: then by fuch a troope, which Dauids valour, and those of his attendants, might either indaunger or refilt. This delay in Absalom, and aduantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the loffe of the one and deliverie of the other. > Dauid being advertised of this enterprize against him marched away al night, and past Iordan, possessing himselfe of Alahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isboseth himselfe in the warre against David after Sauls death seated himselfe. To which place there repayred vnto him Shobi , the sonne of Nahash the Ammonite, 30 whom Dauid loued, the same which Infephus calleth Shiphar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a fecond brother to Hanum, whom Dauld for his fathers fake established in the Kingdome, after Hanums ouerthrow. In thankfulnesse whereof hee relieued David in this his extremitie. There came also to Davids alliftance Machin of Loda bar, Gardian in former times to Mephibolheth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed Dauid and all his companie.

> In the meane time both the King and Abfalom prepared to fight; Abfalom made Amafa Commaunder of the armie of I fract, the fame place which loab held with Dauid; an office next the King himfelfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace aun- 40 ciently in Fraunce. David, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces he had to Iosb, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that iffued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But 10ab, besides that hee was very cruel by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his Gouernment to Amasa, and therefore the victorie being obtained, and newes brought him that Absalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to return and kill him, hee himselfe with his owne servants dispatcht him. It appeared also by the sequell that Iosb affected Adonyah whom hee afterward acknowledged, David yet living; and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the present advantage offered. 50

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and forrowed, not onely as a man that had loft a fonne, but as one that had outlined all his worldly joyes, and feene enery delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after fo great a victorie, couered themselves also in the Citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather descrued death than recompence. Whereupon loab presenting himselfe before David, perswaded him to dissemble his forrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the armie. For first he told him that he had discountenanced his faithfull servants, who had that day preserved his life inferring that nothing could be more daungerous to a King, than not onely to not acknowledge so great a lone and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resoluedly expose themselves to great perils for his sake; but on the contrarie grieue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all have bought their peace of Absalam at an easie rate. Secondly, hee viged that it was generally beleeued, that he loued his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witneffed by this his mourning, that hee had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull feruants, but would more have joyed if they had all perifhed, and sofalam lived, than in the victorie by their faithfulneffe and approved valour gotten.

Lastly heevsed this preualent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himfelfe publikly to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandonhim, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatning : And that will bee 2.5am.15. worse unto thee than all the enill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these overbold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) loab rai-Ad David, from his bed of forrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citie among the people, whom hee affured of his love and affection, especially Amala who commaunded the armie of Abfalom, to whom hee promifed the office of Lieutenantshippe: the same which Absalom had given him, and which loab now enjoyed. For David doubted that if Amasa were not satisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the strength of Ifrael, now under his commandement.

CHAP-17-$-7.

This done, the King marched towards Jordan homeward, where in his paffage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remiffion was 2. Sam. 19.23. but externall, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephibolbeth his excuse. 10 whom Zibahad formerly fally accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall hoste, to follow him to Ierusalem, that he might reward his service done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his fonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gileal on this side Iordan, all the tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the armie brake and David returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba, the sonne of Bichria Benzunite of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontentment among the Israelites, withdrewe them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest ; and it seemeth that many of the people of the out-tribes, and in effect of all but Iuda, bare still a good af-40 fection to the iffues of their first King. David imployed his reconciled Captaine Ama/a, to give him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also because hee conceiued that Amala had interest in those revolts of Israel more than Ioab had. Hereceiued commandement from David to affemble the armie within three dayes, which hee foreflowed : but being onward on his way, Abifhai Ioabs brother was fent after him, with Davids guard and best fouldiers, whom also Ioab accompanied : and ouertaking Amasancere Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, wherof hee fell dead, being no leffe icalous of Amala than hee was of Abner, whom hee murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done he purfued Sheba; and finding him inclosed in Abel, affaulted the Citie with that fu-

50 rie, that the Citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Ioab ouer the walls: which done, he retraited his armie to Ierusalem, and commaunded as before all the host of Israel.

The next act of Dauids, was the deliucrie of Sauls sonnes or kinsmen to the Gibeomites, whom those Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers cruckie. David had knowledge knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibconites : and therefore hee willingly yeelded to give them this fatisfaction, both because hee had warrant from God himselfe, as also if we may judge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom hee and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endaungered; only he spared Wephihosketh the fonne of Ionathan, both for the loue hee bare to his father, as for his oath and you to God.

Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two sonnes of Rise AH whom shee but wate SAVL, and the fine somes of MICHOL the daugh- 10 ter of SAVL, whom shee bare to ADRIEL, and delivered them to the Gi-

Junius cals this Michal the lifter of her that was Davids wife, thee whom Saul maried to Phaltiel; but Atichol here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Damid, when he flew Goliah in the valley of Raphime: and because it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had any humane respect in the deliuctie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Geneua nameth Michel for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrer word here vsed, having an eclipsis or defect, 20 and fignifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinred, as in the 19, verse of the fame 21. Chapter it is faid of Goliah, whose speare was weightie as a weauers beame, when as by the same Eclip is it must be understood by the brother of Goliah: Goliah

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of David, leaving no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forraine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commaunders, the like of whom, for number and qualitie, that people of I/rael is not knowne to have had at any time before or after. Thirtie Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were fixe Coronels, whose valour was so ex- 20 traordinarie, that it might well be held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which feemeth to have beene given vpon meere confideration of their vertue. For Abiliai the brother of Joah, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant and commaunded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the fecond order, notwithstanding his neerenesse in blood vnto the King, the sourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approved fervices. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may feeme to have beene fuch as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers 40 which were mustered and drawne out, if need required into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea or thirtie times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, & bin hardened with his aduerlities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their feuerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with 10ab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the 2.5am.c.23.v. especiall men of warre, and reckoned as Davids worthies. The long reigne of David, as it is knowne to have confumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be gessed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths wee finde nowhere mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruia, who had beene too hard for David, 50 were worne away, and onely Ioab leftin the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abifbai to stand by his side in his last extremitie.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Danid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout, when the posteritie of Saul was rooted out, so that hee enjoyed about feauen yeeres of entire quiet and fecuritie, wherein it pleafed God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the fuccession of Salowon in his fathers throne. In this time also David having established all things in Inda and Ifrael, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in oftentation of his power; in which hee imployed loab with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine moneths and twentie daies trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteene hundred thousand, besides Leui and Benia-2, Samase. min; whereof in india and the Cities thereof fine hundred thousand, and in Ifrael 1.chron.cat. to eight hundred thousand.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seauen yeeres famine, three moneths warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dan made choyce to bowe himselfe under the hand of God onely, and left himfelfe subject to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons. of which there perished seauentie thousand. And hereby he bath taught althat line is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giveth vs this many reason. For his mercies are great.

2. Sam.14c

of the last acts of DAVID: ADONIANS faction: thereuenge TPON IOAB and SHIMEL

Aftly, when hee grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduited to lie in the armes of a yong and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake cleate of bodie, when he was in a manner bedrid, Adonijah his eldeft fonne (Ammon and Abfilom being now dead) having drawne vnto his partie, that inuincible, renowned and feared lock, with Abiathar the Prieft, beganne manifeltly to prepare for his citablishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now living of Davids sonnes, and a man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others fuppose the prefumed to carrie the matter without relistance. Hereof when David had knowledge by Berfabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her some should reigne after him ( Wathin the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, & seconding her report of Adonijah his pre-40 fumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoo the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to annoint Salomon, and to fet him on the mule whereon himfelfe yfed to ride in his greatest state; which done, Salomon attended and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, shewed himselfe to the people. Those tydings being reported to Adonijab, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the fafetie of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, David had remaining two especiall cares, whereof hee was 1.King 1. desirous to discharge his thoughts, the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the 30 building of the Temple, which he fought by all meanes to advance, and make the businesse publique. To bring these intentions to good essect hee summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Ifrael, the Princes of the seuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power; who repaired Vnto Ierufalem.

In this affembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approved the motion. Herein he tooke occalion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iaacob in his bleffing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choice of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor; whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conforme themselves vivo all that God had commaunded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced hee the paterne of the worke according to the forme to which God himfelfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well approved by the Princes and people, that whereas he himselfe had given three thousand talents of golde, and seaven thoufand of filuer, they added vnto it seauen thousand of gold, and ten thousand of siluer, besides brasse, iron and iewels, heartily reioycing in the advancement of so religious a worke. This bulinesse being well dispatched, a solemne feast with great facrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe annointed King, and received fealtie of all the Princes and people of the land, and of all the Princes his brethren the fonnes of King David. Salomon being thus effablished King, his father David 20 finding himselfe even in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the fame courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happic end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mightie words; Take heede to the charge of the Lordity God, to make in his waies, and keepe his flatutes and his commaun lements, and his judgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses &c. to the performance of which God fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (faith God himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit resonth throne of Ifrael.

Secondly, hee aduised him concerning tout, who out of doubt had served David 20 from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, fauing that hee fastened himselfe to Adonijah ( his maister yet liuing) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left crueltie vnreuenged, so was it his will that toab should drinke of the same cuppe, whereof he had enforced other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himselfe had vniuftly froken others with all, qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner and Amasa of their lines, having against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoid him : against the other but a mecre icalousse of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Ioab affured himfelfe that Abner and Amala being dead, 40 there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the pollicies of wicked men) raifed vp Benhaiah the forme of tehoingah, to pull him from the Sanctuarie, and to cut him in pieces. For Daniel giveth this cause to Salomon against Ioab, that he flew the Captaines of the hofte of Ifrael, and fleed bloud of battell in peace; and to this apparant and infection, it is not improbable but that David remembred the ill affection of Joab towards Salomon, which Joab made manifelt by the vntimely fetting vp of Adoniah, David yet living. Some other offence Ioah had committed against David of which in these words he put his son Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what I O A B the sonne of SERVIA II didto mee, &c. Now whether this were ment by the killing of Absalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Mahanaim for Absalom; or whether it were the publishing of Davids letter vnto him for the killing of Vrish: therebyto difgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are filent. True it is that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselues exceeding in olently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot mille them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne many a worthie man otherwise descruing great honour and respect.

Hee allo gaue order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had call itones at David and curfed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promife David spared Shimei all the time himselfe lived, yet being dust and in the graue he flew him, by the hand of Salo men his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seauenth of England had his patterne, when hee gaue order to He n-

rie the eight to execute Pool as foone as himfelte was buried, having made promife to the King of Spaine when hee deliucred Pool vnto him, that while hee liued hee would never put him to death, nor fuffer violent hands to bee laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of loab yeeld vnto Salomon any fuch great profite or affurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumes, and Rezmof Damafeus to vexe him : who, as the Scriptures witnesse, were emboldened to enter- 1.King.112 prize vpon Salomon, hearing that David flept with his fathers, and that loab the Captaine of the hoft was dead. Now when David had reigned in all fortic yeeres, to wit, in Hebron seauen yeeres, and in Jerusalem three and thirtie, he died.

For his person, he was of smal stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts 20 and graces he fo farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was faid by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Pfalmes which hee wrote witnesse his pietie, and his excellent learning: of whome Hierom to Paulinus. DAVID SIMONIDES nofter, PINDARYS & ALCAEVS, FLACCUS, quoque CATVLLVS, & SERENVS, Christam lyrapersonat, & in dechachordo Psalterio abinferis suscitatrefurgentem. And being both a King and a Prophet, hee foretelleth Christ more lightformely and lively than all the rest.

The booke of the Psalmes faith Giyons were divided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Pfalmes were written by Danid it is diverfly disputed. For Athana Sus, Cyprian, Lyranius, & others conceine divers authorics antiwering Hier of $134. the titles of the feueral Pfalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named, and Lyninespits. that onely 73. # Of the treasures of DAVID and SALOMON.

Is treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hun. dred thousand talents of gold, & athousand thousand talents of silver, g and of braffe and yron pairing all weight, which is more than any King of the world possest beilds himselfe, and his son to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirtie and three cartload & athird of a cartioad of filuer, allowing two thousand weight of filuer or fix thousand pound sterling to enery cartload, besides three score and seauenteene millions of 20 French Crownes, or of our money twentie three millions and a thousand pound: a matter but for the testimonic of the Scriptures exceeding all beliefe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare; feeing that the Judges had not any treafure, nor any fourraigne power to make leuies; but when they went to the warres, they were followed by fuch voluntaries as the fenerall tribes by turnes gaue them: feeing also that Saul who was of a meane parentage, and perpetually vexed and innaded by the Philistime, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his territories being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part poffest by his

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how David within the space of not very 30 many yeeres, might amasse vp such mightie treasures. For though parsimonie be it selfea great reuenue, yet needes there must haue beene other great meanes. It feemes that hee made the vttermost profit of all that hee had, that was profitable. Ensebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de preparatione Enangeliea, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Danid among other preparations for the Temple, built a Nauie in Atelanis (or as Villalpandus corrects it Achanis) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Island Vrphe, which Ortelius thinkes, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in his place of Eufebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Island is in the red sea; from whence saith this Eupolemus they brought golde into Iury. Pinedalib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 1. thinks that 40 Dauid did this way also enrich himselfe, and citeth this testimonic of Eupolemus : and yet certainely Dauid had many other waies to gather great riches. Much land doubtlesse he gained by conquest, from the Cananites and Philishims, besides those fruitfull vallies necre lordar in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the 1/r elice. These demaines belike he kept in his owne hands, and with his infinite number of captiues, which hee tooke in his warres, which were not able to redeeme themselues, husbanded those grounds for his greatest aduantage. For it is written 1. Chron. 17. that Ichonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes, that Ezri was over the labourers, that tilled his ground; Simei over the vineyards; and Subdi over the store of the wine; Bast 50 Hanan over the olive trees, and Ioash over the store of the oyle, also that hee had heardmen that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high lands, and in the plaines, ouer his sheepe, camels, and asses. And this custome of enriching themfelues by husbandry and Cattell the auncient Kings enery where held, both before and after Danids time. For wee reade of Pharas that hee spake to Isseph to appoint some of his brethren or of their servants, to be Rulers over his cattell. We reade of Vacia, that he loued husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dreffers of 2.chim.26, Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Heards and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augens and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not vnlikely, but that those captives which were not imploied in hulbandrie, were many of them vsed by him in all forts of gainefull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaues:

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and belides the innumerable prefents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tehu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered : also the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis; By the law of capitation or head money, every man rich or poore paying halfe a ficle of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as fourteene pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand fine hundred and seuentic thousand fighting men 1, chron, 21 were numbred by loab. Now although this Law of capitation be thought by some very learned not to have beene perpetuall ( which opinion of theirs nevertheleffe 20 they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David vpon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practize. And by these meanes might he be able to leave thole huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that of this great masse of gold and filuer left by David, the least part was his owne in private, and so will it appeare the leffe wonderfull that he left fo much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that he gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thoufand talents of filuer, a great fumme : but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needes they must have been, having received continual encrease, without any loffe or diminution ever fince the time of Moses and Iosuah. The re-20 uennues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintayned the Priest and Leuites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the People which remayned at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countrie received benefit of the victorie, yet fo, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people received, and one in fine hundred, of that which was given 40 to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootic. So in the spoile of Midian, thirtie two thousand women being taken, the armie had fixteen thousand of them for flaues, and the Congregation had other fixteen thoufand; but our of the fixteene thouland given to the Armie, were exempted two and thirtie for the Lordstribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twentie. By this meanes, the leffer that the Armie was which had exposed it rie trauaile in domesticall assaires, did receiue by so much the greater portion. But the Lordstribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by 50 some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and filter, and other metralls found in Iericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulnesse of the Rulers and 10, 6, 19. People, as when after the victorie obtayned against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Iewells, Bracelets, Eare-rings, and the like, were offered vp, as volun- Namb 31.50. tarie presents.

selfe to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remayning at home were faine to vndergoe more than ordina-

1.Chron c.26. 2.37. 6 28.

Now how soeuer the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden downe by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemics neuer gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot other. wife be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must have beene exceeding great; as contaying about one hundreth part of all the money and other goods found by the Ifraelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtayned against the bordering Nations. For that this treasurie was not defrauded of the due portion, it is euident; feeing that before the time of Danid and his Lieutenant Ioab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had vied to dedicate of the spoiles obtayned in warre, to maintayne the 10 house of the Lord : the like wherof may be well prefumed of the former Judges and Captaines in other Ages. Certaine it is, that the Conquest of Danid brought into the Land farre greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchafed, those of Iofua perhaps excepted : but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of filuer, may feeme rather to have beene made vp, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to have beene the meere fruits of his owne industrie. Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them:

for he received of yearely revenues with his tributes fixe hundred fixtie fixe Tato his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of ter fortie yeares raigne, and seuentie yeares of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, riches, and honour, and was buried in the Citic of Danid. It is written by Tolephus 30 that there was hid in Danids Tombe a meruailous quantitie of treasures, in so much as Hyrcanus ( who first of the Chasmanai, or race of the Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeares after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging terusalem, and afterward Herod opening an other Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and silver therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvi as and other Americans did the like, which being discourred by the Spaniards, they inviched themselucs by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salemon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleeved, in regard of the great exactions with which he was faine to burthen the people, not with standing altheriches 40 which he got otherwise, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall confidered that his want of monie grow from such magnificent imploiments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of David the Scriptures have no mention, but only the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monuments of those Kings, as (by Relation of the Duke of Vlika) they remay ned within these thirtie yeares, and are like to remaine still, are able to make any report credible, of the cost bestowed vpon them.

of the Philistims, whom DAVIDabsolutely maistered; and of fundry other contemporaries with DAVID.

F the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of Dauids time somewhat here may bee was furnamed Edom, and Iacob Ifrael. There were of them five Cities of pettic principalities; namely, Azotus or Aldod, Gaza or Aczaph, Alcalon, Geth or Gath, and Acca- 1. Sam. 6. ron. It feemeth that Callorn was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Agyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that A- Genaco. himelech which loued Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then reliding at Gerar in the border of Idumaa, which Abimelech fancied Isaac his wife: as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philislims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till Davids time: perhaps the government was turned into Ariflocraticall. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, how soener Achis be named king 11d. 16.1. Sam. of Gath, the same to whom Dauid fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in 18.29.

After him wee read of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Semei trauailed to fetch backe his fugitiue feruant, what time the feeking of his feruant was the loffe of his life. Ieremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palassin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the 30 warres of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Indges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not neede to collect the particulars in this

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvij King of Alba called Latinus Siluius, who is faid to have ruled that part of Italy fiftie yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeere Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontida, without regall name gouerned Athens during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, was not drawne from any inconvenience found in the rule of Soueraigntie, but in honour 40 of Codrus onely. For when the Gracians of Doris, a region betweene Phocis and the mountaine Octa, fought counfaile from the Oracle, for their fuccesse in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered that then undoubtedly they should prevaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any victorie against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answere, withdrewe himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common fouldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountred, was himselfe forthwith cut in Enpales the 21. King of Assiria, which others account but the 20. began to rule 50 that Empire, about the 12 . yeere of David, and held it 38. yeeres.

Necrethe same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraclida, the sonne of Eurysthenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraelide in Lacedemon: in honour of which Aeis, his successours were called Agide, for many yeeres after. He restored the Laconians to their former libertie: hee ouercame the Citizens of V u 2.

Helosin Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: hee condemned them and theirs to perpetuall flauerie; wherofit came, that all the Meffenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like fort from the Selani came the word Slane. For when that Nation iffuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seised upon the countrie of Illyria and made in their owne by Conquest, their victoric pleased them so highly, that therupon they called themselves by a new name, Slavos, which is in their language glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate having thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden down, and made sertiants to their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage began to cal all their bondmen-Slaues, vling the word as a name of reproche: in which sense it is now currant through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of Danid, and laie that Scheffratus was the fourth King of Eufeb.in chron, this race, the same whome Eufebius cals Labores, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere

He was buried (faith Paulanias) in one of the gates of Ephelius called Magnetes, his armed Statua being fet 20 ward Magness ouer him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had Subdued the Ionians (the next vpon the river province to Ephelus on the lea coult of Alis the leffe) he inlarged his Dominions vppon the Loles, which iowneth to Jonia: and that his posteritic governed the Cities Arif. 1.5. pole. 6. of Ephefus and Erythre by the Haffac of Bafilide in Strabo his owne time. Of theex-*seech in this pedition of the lones how they came hither out of Pelepone is, I have * spoken alreadie vponoccasion of the returne of the Heraelide into Peloponesus, wherein with the Dores, they expelled the Achei, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the Iones succeeded that of the Hernolida 100 yeeres.

The Citie of Ephefus became exceeding famous : first, for the temple of Diana therein built : which had in length 425, foote, and 220. in bredth, fultained with 30 127. pillars of marble, of 72. foote high: whereof 27. were most curiously grauen, and all the rest of choice marble polisht, the worke being first set out by Ciesiphonof Gnossos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timothie was Bishop; to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epifles fo intituled. The other Citie poffest by Androclus in Aelis was also vniuerfally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythrea: who lived feuen hundred and fourtie yeeres before Christ borne. Saint Augustine augweth that a Romane Proconful shewed him in an auncient Greeke coppie certaine verses of this Prophetesse: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these wordes. Iesus Christus Dei filius saluator. Iesus Christ sonne of God the 40 Saulour.

About the time that Ioab belieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres beganne to gouerne in Egypt, the same that was father in Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Eulebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the citie of Magnelia in Asia the leffe founded, the same which is feated upon the river Maander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. Eulebius and Cassiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. yeere of Danid, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Metinus the fonne of Badezor brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and betweene the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95. yeeres.

In this time also Acastus lined, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, Eurobian Chron. of which there were thirteene in descent before the State changed into a Magistracie of which there were thirteen in detection perfore the State Change unto a magnificant of tenne yeeres. Some writers make it probable that the Lolians ledde by Graus, Home of Strab. the grandnephew of orestes, possess the Citie and Island of Lesbos about this time. In 1.14. 10 the 32. yeere of David, Hiram beganne to reigne in Tyre, according to lofephus, who dating 8. cont. faith that in his twelfth yeere Salomon beganne the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in to fephus, to mifreckon times, which in this point hee doth fo strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any accompt. For it is manifest that Hiram sent messengers, and Cedars to Danid, soone after his taking of Ierusalem, which was in the very beginning of Davids reigne ouer Ifrael, when as yet hee had reigned onely seauen yeeres in Hebron, ouer the house of juda. Wherefore it must needes be that Hiram had reigned aboue 30. yeeres before Salomon; vnleffe more Sams. credit should be given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Tosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram 20 which lived both with David and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainely manifest.

CHAP. XVIII. Of SALOMON.

Of the establishing of SALOMON: of birthright, and of the cause of ADONIAH's death, and of SALOMONS wisdome.

ALO MON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, beganne to reigne ouer Iuda and Ifrael, in the yeere of the world 2991. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iediddia, or Theophilus, by Nathan because the Lord loued him.

The beginning of Salamon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after Danids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to bee flaine by Benaiah 50 the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah his desiring by Bersheba, that the young maid Abishag, which lay in Davids bosome in his latter daies, to keepe him warme, might be given him. What socuer hee pretended it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and fought the kingdome contrary to the will of Da-#id, whom God inclined towardes Salomon. enough to the wife, and he that fees but the claw, may know whether it bee alvon or no: fo it may feeme that to the quick-fighted wildome of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had beene concubines to a King, might not after bee touched but by a King: whence Achitothel wished Absalon to take his fathers concubines as a part of the royaltie. And David after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but, thut them vp, and they remained widowed until their death. And this it feems was the depth of Isbofbeths quarrel against Abner, for having his fathers concubine. And some lignification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God

2. Sam, 20.30. by Nathan to David; I have given thee thy masters house, and thy masters wives. And in the 10 words of Saul, vpbraiding Jonathan that hee had chosen Danid to the shame of the nakednesse of his mother. Hercunto perhaps was some reference in this purpose of Adonyah, to marrie with her that was alwaies present with Danid in his latter daies. and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdome to Salamon. There might be divers farther occasions, as either that hee would learne fuch things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perlivade her to forge fome strange tale about Lauids last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon. As for the right of an elder brother which Adonyah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the cultomes of the lenes : yet the 20 Kings of the teres were fo absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples aiso they had (though not of kings) which taught them to vie this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne; namely of lacobs differiting Reuben, and giving the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in David, it appeares by noferto, dando et the words of Berfabe and Nathan to David, and of Ionathan to Adonyah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusall of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it nowhere appeares in the stories of the Jewes. It is faid indeed that the people made Saul King 30 at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that hee was King r Kingali. 2.20 long before no man can doubt. In like manner elswhere the physic of chuling or making their King, is to bee expounded: as wherein the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said. Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord Shall chufe. But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that he put Adonial to death, he ridde himfelfe alfo of Ioab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as Daniel had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest abiathar, who tooke part with Alongah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his father, he spared his life 40 And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Vaplines King of Egypt to wife : for fo Eufebius out of Eupolemus cals him. Hee offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bad-him aske what he would at his hands; SALOMON chooseth wildome, which pleased God. And God faid unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, thave done according to thy words : by which wee may informe our felues what defires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coueting after long life, in respect of our selves, cannot but proceede of selfe-love, which is the roote of all impietie: the delire of private riches is an affection of conetoulnelle which God ab- 50 horreth; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the fword out of Gods hand and to distrust his Instice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers flaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from Danid, or from the Law of God. But because Saiomon delired wildome onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleafed God to give him withail that which he defired not. And I have also given thee (faith God) that which thou half not asked both riches and honour. This gift of wildome our Commentators firetch to aimost all kindes of learning; but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plantes and living creatures the Scripture testifieth, though no doubt the chiefe excellencie of Salomens wildome, was in the knowledge of gouerning his kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wisdome, the Scripture telleth how foone he judged the controucrate betweene the two harlots.

è. II.

Of SALOMONS buildings and glorie.

E then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom hee had much of his materials, from the Kings palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another for God. For like as it is written of David that He called S A L O M O N his sonne, and charged him to build a

30 house for the Lord God of Ifrael : fo doth Toffatus give the force of a divine precept to 1. Chr. 22.6. thele words. Behold; a some is borne unto thee, &c. Hee shall builde an house for Tof. 9.26.in Hee beganne the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the 4. yeere of his I.Kim.e.6.v. reigne, at which time also hee prepared his fleete at Estingaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supplie the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleetes were paffing to and fro it is manifelt. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Aimagging trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof 1. (bron. 28, 20 the forme and example was given by God himfelfe) many learned men have writ-30 ten, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Burradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the reader.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed thirtie thouland Carpenters, tenne thouland every moneth by courfe he also yied eightie thousand Masons in the mountaine, and seauentie thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceined, he felected out of the Profelites, be- 1.Kine.s. fides three thousand three hundred maisters of his worke, so as he paid and imployedinallone hundred eightie three thousand and three hundred men, in which number the Zielonians which were more skilful in hewing timber than the Ifraelites, may (as I think ) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring downe the Ce-40 dars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in rasses to Joppe or the I.Kin.5.0.9. next port to Hierusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plaine that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the ouerseers, were strangers, and as it feemeth the vaffals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. In re- 1. Kin. 5.11. compence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gaue Hiram twentie thousand meafures of wheate, and twentie measures of pure oyle yeerely. Eufebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth booke of his preparation the last Chapter, hath lest vs a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the fame as Huram or Hiram) King of Tyre in thefe words.

JO D EN SALOMON S V R O N I, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phanicia regi. Amico paterno N salutem. Scias me à Deo magno D a v 1 D patris mei regnum accepisse, cum g, mili pater pracepit tem plum Deo, qui terram creauit, condere, vt etiam ad te scriberem pracepit : Scriboigitur, & peto a te vt artifices atque fabros ad adificandum Templum Dei mittere K Ing SALOMON to King SVRON, of Tyre, Sydon, and Phanicia King, and myfa-ihers friend, fendeth greeting, Tou may understand that I have received of the great God of my father DAVID, the Kingdome : and when my father commanded mee to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, hee commaunded also that I should write to you. I write therefore to you, and befeech you, that you would bee pleafed to fend mee artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answere.

SVRON, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phaniciarex, SALOMONI regi falutem. Lectis literis gra- 10 tias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam feribis fabros minifrolf, ad condendum Templum ese tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudea, virum in rebus architectur e mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessarijs non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

CVRONOF Tyre Sidon and Phanicis King, to King SALOMON greeting: when I Dread your letters, I gaue Godthankes, who hath inflatled you in your fathers Kingdome. And because you write, that carpenters and workemen may be fent to build Gods Temple, 1 haue fent unto you four ejeore thou fand men, and a Maifter builder a Tyrian, borne of 4 lewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessaries be provided 20 10f.Ani.1.3.c. 2. for them, and when the Temple of God is built that they come home to us.

The Copies of these letters were extant in Iosephus time as himselfe affirmeth, and to be seene, saith he, Tamin nostrus quamin Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he deliuereth them somewhat in different tearmes, as the reader may finde in his antiquities. But were this intercourse betweene Salomon and Hiram either by meffage or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise deliuered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Iosephus set it downe, but, so that in subthe r.v. to the 9. flance there is little difference between the one and the other.

The like letter in effect S. domon is faid to have written to Vaphres King of Agypt 20 and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commentors upon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Agypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemonin Eusebieu, I doe not finde any such addition of magnes in Eusebieus in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in sofethus in the eight booke and second chapter of the lenves antiquities: it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Assirian and Perfian Kings, and vied likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finithing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wal, & repaired Hazor which had benethe auncient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Iosuahs time: so did he Gaza of the Philylims: he built Bethoron, Gerar and the Millo or munition of Hierulalem. For Pharaoh ( as it feemeth in fauour of Salomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar which the Cansanites yet held & put them to the fword and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie he gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then bussed in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entreated his father in lawe to rid him of those neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But he thereby taught the Agyptians to vilite those partes a- 50 gaine before they were fent for; and in his sonne Rehoboams time Sheshack this mans fucceffor did facke lerufalem it felfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Iordan; and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the defart of Inda ( or as IofeCHAP. 18. S.z. of the Historie of the World.

thinkes Palmyra in the defart of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the vtmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Daniels conquest when hee wanne Damaseus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost; and fortified it with the best arte, that that age had. 10/cphus cals this place Thedamora, by which name (faith hee) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places cale it Thermeth. In aftertimes, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperor it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In refpect of this great charge of building Saloman raifed tribute through all his Dominions, belides and hundred and twentie talents of gold 10 recented from Hiram fernants, Sullomon offered Hiram twentie townes in or neere the opper Gailee, but because they stood in an unstruitfull and marith ground Hiram refuled them, and thereof was the territoric called Chabilly more

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Won quod gentes ibi habitarent : fed quia sub ditione regis gentilis erat, Not that it was posselt by Gentiles (faith Nanclerus but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. How former it were, it is true that Salomen in his 27, yeare fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, he made a journey into Syria Zobah and established histributes; the first and last warre (if in that expedition hee were driven to fight) that hee made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions passing from 20 Thadmer to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Deserts of Idumea, from whence hee visited Esiongaber and Eloth, the vetermost place of the South of all his territorics, bordering to the red sea; which Cities I have described in the Storie of Mofes.

Of SALOMON'S fending to Ophir, and of some feeming contradictions about SALOMONS riches, and of PINEDAES ... nied « conceipt of two strange passages about

cidmo ná

Ere Salomon prepared his fleete of shippes for India with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Marriners and Pilots, the Tyrims being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by Danid, did the Fleete passe on to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluceas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnessethe Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the aboundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and reco-40 uer agreat quantitie from thence, and with lesselabour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by theseshippes amounted to source hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written foure hundred and fiftie talents: wherof thirtie talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men, and foure hundred and twentie talents, which makes hue and twentie hundred and twentie thou fand Crownescame cleere. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of fixe hundred fixtic and fix talents of gold, that fumme, as I take it, is of other receipts of salemons which were yeerely, and which came to him belides these profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedie returne to terusalem from the East Indies then in 3. c.8.5 9.10 3. yeeres; and that Thar fis in Scripture is diverstimes taken for the Ocean; hath beene Sale none, 6. alreadie declared in the first booke...

Oncly

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits. who being a Spaniard of Batica would faine have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tarteffus, which is the Southwest corner of that Province, to be the Tharfis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for love of his owne countrie, and because of some affinitie of sound between Tharsis and Tartellin. For whereas it may feeme strange that it should be three yeere ere they, that tooke shippe in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath bene in part answered alreadic. And further the intelligent may conceiue of fundry lets, in the digging and refining of the mettall, and in their other trafficke, and in their land-carriages betweene lerusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also elswhere: so that 10 wee haue no neede to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that To they might bee long a comming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not have beene ignorant of) was along the Mediterran sea, and so ( besides many wonderfull inconveniences and terrible nauigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome land-carriage betweene lerufalem and the red sea through drie, desart, and theeuish Countries: and within 30. mile of Ierufalem at Joppe, or some other hauen in Salomons owne Coun-trie, haue laden and unladen their lhips.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largneffe greater than all Africk and Asa being swallowed up in the Atlantic Ocean hindered Salomons thips from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this hee alleadgeth Plato in Timeo. But that this calamitic happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mudde and made vnpassable, that there could bee no comming to Gades by the Mediterran fea: or that this indraught where the fea runneth most violently, and most easily scourcth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Island is supposed to have stoode : or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitly 30 better and neerer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Affrica, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselie that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East Indies and inhabites fome part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold (the fmall territorie which he there poffesseth considered) than in Peru. The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elfwhere he dreames of : supposing whereas lonas failing to Tharsis the Citie of Cilicia As it appeares was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this whale in three dayes swimming aboue twelve thousand English miles, along the Mediterran feas, and so through the streights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about 40 Africa, cast vp Ionas vpon the shore of the red sea, that so hee might have perhaps fome fixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Nimite. This conceipt hee grounds onely upon the ambiguitie of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red sea (as if wee should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for thered sea. But in Ionas 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper fignification for weeds, and not as Pineds would have it, who in this place against his owne rule (which elfewhere he giueth vs) fupposeth strange miracles without any neede. For this long voyage of the whale finished in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of longs in the bellic of the whale and therefore seing there is no necessitie of this miracle, we fend it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which in 50 this place he forgets; Miracula non funt multiplicanda. And againe, Non funt miracula gratis danda nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necefsuie, nor delivered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore to leave this man in his dreames, which (were hee not otherwise very learned and indicious) might bee thought vinworthic the mentioning. But to proceede with our Storie of

The Queene of Sabaes comming from farre to Salomon, (as it seemes from Arabisfælix, & not as some think from Athiopia and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocal magnificence, and his refoluing of her difficult queltions, those are set downer at large in the text. But herein Infephus is greatly mistaken, who cals this Queene of Saba Nicaules, the fuccessour (faith hee out of Herodotus) of those thirtie and eight Agyptian Kings which fucceded Miness the founder of Memphis; adding that after this Leyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left Ichant, 8, 1, 2, 10 off in Agypt. For as it is elfwhere proued that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Agypt and Etbiopia; fo were there other Pharachs after the father in Law of Salomon.

Yea, aboue three hundred yeeres after Salomon, Pharao Necho flew Iolias King of 2 Kin c. 23 &

It is also written of Salomon that hee kept in garrifons fourteene thousand chariots and twelue thousand horsemen; that he spent in Court every day thirtie measures of fine flower, threescore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, befides flags and fallow deare, bugels and foule; foure thousand stals of horses he had for his chariots and other vies, and for the twelve thousand hosemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stals in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so 20 many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but source thousand stals or teemes, and in every teeme ten horses, as Junius and the Genera vn- 1.King.4.215 derstand it. He was faid to be wifer than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Junius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrak. For the Geneua maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Iolephus writes them Athan. Aman, Chalceus and Donan the fonnes of Hemon. Hee spake three thousand Pro-

uerbes, and his fonges were one thousand and fine, whereof either the most part perished in the Captinitie of Babylon, or else because many actes of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Civill causes and not Ecclesiaflicall, therefore they were not thought necessarie to bee inserted into Gods of the fall of SALOMON, and how long he lived.

Owas hee had plentie of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women, For belides his seauen hundred wines hee kept three hun-If dred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commaunded that none of his people should accompanie the daughters of Idolators) hee tooke wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moub, Ammon, Zidon and Heth : and when hee fell a doting, his wives turned his heart after other Gods, as Alteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Wolcoh of the Ammonites, and Chemoft of Mosb.

These things God punished by Adadof Iduman, Rezin of Damaseus, and by Ieroboam his owne feruant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie hee had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis viitur, que ipf non fecit. God in punishing finners, vseth the finnes of others, which hee himselfe P.Mart.in reg.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in tymes of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence and that great Indian voyage alreadic mentioned. Fourtie yeeres hee reigned: how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore bee found onely by conjecture The most likelie way to guesse at the truth in this case, is by considering the action, of David before and after Salomons birth, whereby wee may best make estimation of the yeeres which they confumed, and confequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his natiuitie. Seauen yeeres Danid reigned in Hebron : in his eight yeere hee tooke lerufalem, and warred with the Philiftims, who also troubled him the yere following. The bringing home of the Arke feemes to have beenein the tenth yere of Dauid, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere enfuing, at which time he had fufficient leyfure, living in reft. After this he had warres with the Philistims, Mosbites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needes have held him five yeeres, considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in euery of these warres, he had the entire victorie. Neither is it likely that these services occupied any longer time, because in those daies and places there were no wintering campes in vse, but at convenient feafons of the yeere, Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vppon the spoyle of the enemies countrie, partly upon the prinate prouision which enery souldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of Danid in which hee tooke Mephiboseth the son of fonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the yeere following to have begunne the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for loab after the victorie, returned immediatly to Ierufalem) the causes and preparations for that war having taken 20 vp all the fummer. Davids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein hee brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer vnder his owne allegiance, appeares manifeftly to have beene the next yeeres worke, wherein he did cut off all meanes of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumaa being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must have beene the 20. yeere of Davids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he fent forth loab to befiege Rabba, and finished him by God, for his foule and bloudie offence. Now very manifest it is that in the yeere after the death of that childe, which 30 was begotten in adulterie, Salomon was borne, who must needes therefore have beene nineteene yeres old or thereabout, when he beganne to reigne at the deccase of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned in the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Vriahs wife. So one halfe

of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great sorrow by the expectation, execution, and fad remembrance of that heavie judgement laid vpon

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Danid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Absalom slewe his brother Ammon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to have beene one yeres worke. 40 So the rebellion it felfe with all that happenned thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amafa and the rest, may well seeme to have beenein the 30. yeare of Danids reigne.

Whether the three yeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last yeres of warre with the Philistims or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to coniccture. Plaine enough it is, that in the tenne remaining yeeres of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbring the people, with the peftilence enfuing; as also for his owne last infirmitie, and disposing of the Kingdom. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or 50 foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or 200 neere vnto Gezer and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims undertooke, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Davids old age, for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwardes himCHAP.18. S.5. of the Historie of the World.

dered by his men from exposing himselfe vnto danger any more. So Danid had fixe or feuen yeares of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owne age) whereby the flirring spirit of Acionijah found little succour in the broken partie of loab the sonne of Zernia.

At this time it might both truly be faid by Dautd to Salomon. Thou art a wife man, 1.Kine. 62.26. and by Salomon to God, I am but a yong child; for nineteene yeares of age might $63.5.7.

wellagree with either of these two speeches.

Neuertheleffe there are some that gather out of Salomons profeshing himselfe a child, that he was but eleuen yeares old when he beganne to raigne. Or these Kabbi to Salomon seemes the first Authour, whom other of great learning and judgement have herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps youn that which is said of Absolous rebellion, that it was after fortic yeares, which they understand as yeares 2.5am,15.70 of Danidsraigne. But whereas Rehoboam the fonne of Salomon was 41. yeares old when hee beganne to raigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten him, being himselfe but a child of nine or ten yeares old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who raigned fortic yeares) were but eleuen yeares old when his raigne began. To avoid this inconvenience, Josephus allowes 80. yeares of raigne to Salomon; a report fo difagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needes no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion construed the wordes of Iosephus, as if they included all the yeares of Salomons life. But by fuch reckoning hee should have beene 40. yeares old at his Fathers death; and confequently should have beene borne long before his Father had wonne Ierusalem; which is a manifest vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeares remembred in Absidons rebellion, may either feeme to have reference to the space betweene Dauids first annointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to lofephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) foure yeares; which passed betweene the returne of Absolon to Ierasalem, and his breaking out.

of SALOMONS mritings.

Here remaine of Salomons workes, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the Song of Salomon. Of whom Straeides writeth in this manner. SALOMON raigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that he might build a house in his name, and prepare the San-Etuarie for ever; How wife wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a flou!! Thy minde concred the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and darke sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, e.c. but thus he concludeth. Of SALOMONS Successors untill the end of IEHOSAPHAT.

EHOBOAM the Son of Salomon by Nahamaan Ammonitelle, now fortie yeares olde, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was annointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Ifrael were affembled : who attended a while the returne of Ieroboam as yet in Agypt, fince he fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arrivall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father, Sicenim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quam Ant 18, 64. metui; So (hould his Empire (faith I osePHVs) bemore assured if hee desired rather to bee beloued than feared:

whereof he tooke three daies to deliberate before his answere, of whom therefore it could not be faid as of David, that he was wifer than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe heeknew not how to resolve, so had hee not the judgement to discerne of counsells, which is the very test of wisedome in Princes, and in all menelse. But notwithstanding that he had consulted with those graue and aduised men, that ferued his Father, who perfwaded him by all meanes to fatisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not only to continue on the backs of his 40 fubices those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting fally of greatneffeexceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heavier, and more vnfupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the fuccesse, those yonger adulfors greatly mistooke the nature of seueritie, which without the temper of clemencie is no other than crueltie it felfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be vsed for the helpe, and not for the harme of subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people ? and what cordes or fetters haue ener lasted long, but those which have been twisted and forged by lone only? His witleffe paralites could well judge of the Kinges disposition : and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all thinges elfe, it fufficed and inabled them fuf-30 ficiently for the places they held. But this answere of Rehoboam did not a little aduance Ieroboams designes. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achiah of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no fooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people crying out what portion have wee in Danid? wee have no inheritance in the Sonne of iffait. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes of If ael, bad confented to Davids annointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledgeing that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebelis. they forgat both the bonds of nature, and their dutie to God, and, as all alienated refolued hearts doe, they ferued themselves for the present with impudent excuses.

And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam fent Adorain, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hatefull to all his Subjects, to pacific them: whom they instantiy beate to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from 1.King 12. 21. Siehem with all speede, and recourred terufilem, where preparing to inuade Ilrael. with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, shemai in the person of to God commanding to the contrarie, all was staied for the prefent. In the meane time lerobosm the new King fortified Sechem on this tide, and Penuel on the other fide of Iordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of David; and having in all likelyhood also promised the Japans to follow their Idolatrie: he set up two Calues of gold for the Children of grad to worthip, impioully perfuading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented those Gods, which deliuered them out of Egypt and refusing the service of the Leuites, hee made Pricits fit for such Gods. It must needes be that by banishing the Leuites which served Daniel and Salomon through all 4, a.e., Ieroboam greatly inriched himfeife: as taking into his hands 20 all those Cities which were given them by Alojes and Iojua, for as it is written. The Leuises left ter fuburbs, and then popiefison, and came to Iuca, &c. This irreligious pollice of Ierobo.m (which was the foundation of an Idolatrie that neuer could be rooted out, untill freel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecieand miracles impouned fufficiently when it first beganne; but the affections maintaining it, were fo flrong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Ieroboim could not bee moued now by the authoritic of alia, who from the Lord had first promised unto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as hee stretched it oper the Altar, which also claue a-sunder, according to the figne, which the man of God had given by the commandement of 32 God, who againe recourred and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obflinete an Idolater as before, for he held it the fast it course in pollicie to proceede as he had begunne. This impious invention of Ierobo.m, who for fooke God, and the religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a might me Historian compared with the policies of late Ages, observing well the practile of his Nation, being an Italian borne. of Rehoboam his impietie; for which he was punished by Sesac: of his end and Contemporaries.

Hile Ieroboam was occupied in fetting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other fide having now little hope to recouer the Provinces loft, ftrengthened the principall places remaining with all endeuour: for he fortified and victualled fifteene Cities of Iudah and Beniamin : 2. chran, its not that he feared lerobeam alone, but the Agyptians, to whom leroboam had not only fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to inuade Indea: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of David and Salomon, which might now eafily bee had, seeing ten of the twelue Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Iudeans. So as by those two waies (of late yeares often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraine force, Jeroboam hoped to fettle himfelfe in the feate of Ifrael, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatrie in a few yeares after rooted out with all his. Rehoboam also having, as he thought, by fortifying divers places affured his estate, for sooke the Law of the living God, i. And therefore in the fifth yeare of his raigne, sefae or shifts before fpoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumaa, as Ieroboam, were familiar and his instruments, entred Indea with twelve thousand Chariots, and a chron, 12. 3; three score thousand Horse, belides foote-men, which to sephus numbers at foure to said. 8.c. 45 hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations, Agyptians, Lubeans, Succeans, and Culites. The Lubeans were Lybeans, the next bordering Region to Levet, on the West side. The Custes were of Petran, and of the Defart A. rabia, which afterward followed Zerah against A/4 King of Iuda. The Succeans, ac- 1. With this great and powerfull Armie, Sefac inuaded Indea, and (besides many otherstrong Cities) wanne Ierusalem it selfe, of which, and of the Temple, and 30 Kings house, he tooke the spoile, carrying away (besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, in imitation of those which David recovered from Adadezer, in the Syrian warre: thefe Rehobosm Supplied with Targets of braffe, which were fit enough to guard a King of his qualitie: whom Siracides calleth The foolishnesse of the people. From Eufeb. Chron.

From this time forward the Kings of Agypt claimed the four raigntie of Indian. and held the lenes as their Tributaries : Sefue, as it feemes, rendring up to Rehoboans his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the wordes of God. where promiting the deliuerance of Iuda after their humiliation, he doth not withstanding leave them under the yoke of Agypt, in these wordes. Neverthelesse they (to wit, the Indicans) Shall be his fernants, that is, the fernants of SESAC.

After this ouerthrow and dishonour Rehoboam raigned twelve yeares, and his losses received by Sefae notwithstanding, hee continued the warre against Jeroboan all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned I/rael foure yeares, Rehoboam liued 58. yeares, and raigned 17. his storie was written at large by She- to meiah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan & the rest.

About the 12.0f Rehoboam Abdastrartus King of Tyre was murthered by his Nurfes fons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdom twelue yeares. Towards his latter times Peritiades, or Pyrithiades, beganne to gouerne Afyria, the 3.4. King thereof: and not long after Aftartus the sonne of Balcastartus recovered 20 the Kingdome of Tyre from the Vlurpers.

Of the great battaile betweene IEROBOAM and ABIA, with a Corolaric of the examples of Gods indgements.

Bijah the Sonne of Rehoboum, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He railed an Armic of foure hundred thousand, with which he inuaded troboum, who encountred him with a double number of 30 eight hundred thouland; both Armies joyned neare to the Mount Ephraim, where teroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of ifrael broken; for there fell of that fide fine hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now mafter of the field, recouered Bethel, Ieshanah, and Ephron, soone after which discomsiture, le obam died : who raigned in all 22. yeares. Abijah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may be s. Chron. 16. 23. gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he raigned but three yeares and then died; the particulars of his acts were written by Idde the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Here wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his Sonne 40 Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and a Traitor; and then by the successor of that Agrptian, whose daughter Salomon had maried, thereby the better to assure his estate, which while he scrued God, was by God affured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when hee for fooke him, it was torne a-funder by his meanest Vassalls; Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Agyptian Sefac. For the some Abijah was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men and with the same number he ouerthrew eight hundred thousand Ifraelites, and slew of them fine hundred thousand, God gining spirit, courage, and invention, when and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People : the same being both before, 50 and at the instant deliuered by Prophets; so the same just God who liueth and gouerneth all thinges for euer, doeth in these our times giue victorie, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw downe Kinges, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present : for which reason in these and other the affictions of I/rael, alwaies 2.5am.27.1. the causes are set downe, that they might bee as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Dauids time for three yeeres, Fer Saul and his bloudie house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffred all forts of affilitions. and forrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had tenne tribes of twelve torne from his fonne for his idolatrie. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by Sefac of Egypt, because the people of Inda made images, high places, and groues &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the land. Ieroboam was punished in him selfe & his posteritie for the golden Calues that he creeted. Ioram had all his sonnes slaine by the 10 Philiftims, and his very bowels torne out of his bodie by an excoriating flix, for murthering his brethren. Abab and Iezabel were flaine, the bloud of the one, the bodie of the other caten with dogs: for the false accusing and killing of Nabeth. So also hath God punished the same and the like sinnes in all after-times, and in these our daies by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sicknesse, and calamities, howfocuer the wife men of the world raife these effectes no higher than to fecond causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and eares, feeme to them to worke euery alteration that happeneth.

O Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time he established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. from her regencie, brake her Idoll, stampt it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities and other places, prouiding (as prouident Kings doe) for the troubles of war 30 in the leasure of peace. For not long after hee was inuaded by Zerah, who then commaunded all the Arabians bordering Indea, and with fuch a multitude entred the territorie of A/a, as (for any thing that I have read) were never affembled of that Nation either before or fince. For it is written, that there came against the Iudeans Zerah of Athiopia with an host of tenne hundred thousand, and three hun- 2. Chron. 14%. dred Chariots, which Aa encountred with an armie of fine hundred and fourefore thousand, leuied out of those two tribes of Iuda and Beiamin which obeyed him, and with which he ouerthrew this fearefull multitude, and had the spoile both of their Cities and Campe.

That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian I haue*proved alreadie, and were it but the "In the for-40 length betweene Athiopia and Indea, and the strong florishing, regions of Agypt in-mer booke cast teriacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to passe through them) it $10,000. were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is that these inuaders were Æthiopians. But in that the scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoyled by the Indeans in following their vistoric, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Befor, which David past over when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians, this producth sufficiently that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier towne standing on the vttermost South-border of all Indea, from all parts of Athiopia fix hundred miles. Also the spoiles which Asi tooke, as the 50 cartell, Camels, and sheepe, whereof he sacrificed fine thousand, shew them to bee Arabians adioyning, and not far off, and not vnknowne Athiopians. And if it be obiefted that these desart countries can hardly yeeld a million of men sit for the wars, Innswere, that it is as like that Arabia Petrea, and the Defart which compasse two parts of the holy land, thould yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two tribes of the twelue, should arme fine hundred and foure score thousand. Besides it answer reth to the promife of God to Abraham, that these nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Ismsel, that he would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelue Princes,&c.

Baisha a king of israel began to reigne in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnelle of Alaafter his great victorie, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adalezer, to loyne with him against A/a; and to the end to block him vp, hee fortified Rama which lieth in the way from Ierufalem towardes Sa-

This warre began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. yeere of A- 10 2. Chron. 6. v. 1. Ja his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Bufba died in the 26. yeare of A/a, therefore could not Baa/ba begin this warre in the 35. of A/a his reigne, but in the 35, yeere of the divition of Inda and Ifrael: for fo many yeeres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Ala. It may feeme strange that Asa being able to bring into the field an armie of five hundred and fourescore thousand good souldiers, did not casily drive away Baalha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Ala himfelfe against Zerah being yet fresh in minde, which might well have emboldened the men of Inda and afmuch difficurtened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the text, which caused asato fight at this 20 time with mony. It may be that the employment of so many hundred thousands of hands in the late feruice against Zerah, had caused many mens private businesses to lie undispatched, whereby the people being now intentine to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be viewilling to Hirre against the Ifraelites, choosing rather to winke at apparant inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might have deterred Afafrom aduenturing himfelfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the successe into the hands of God. Howsocuer it were, he tooke the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian again Baasha, whose imployments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake of confederacie with Baasha. For 30 the I/raelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himfelfe (after his inualion) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themfelues masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephthalim without relistance, he spoiled divers principall cities thereof, and inforced Basshato quit Rama, and to leave the fame to Afa with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the fame : which done, Benhadad who loued neither partie, being loden with the spoiles of Ifrael, and the treasures of Inda, returned to Damaseus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Afain that he now relyed on the ftrength of Syria, and did not rest himselfe on the fauour and affistance of God, he not onely caused Hanani to bee imprisoned, but hee began to burden and oppresse 40 his people, and was therefore strooken with the grieuous paines of the gout in his fecte, wherewith after he had beene two yeeres continually tormented, he gauc vp the ghost when he had reigned 41, vecres.

Of the great alteration falling out in the Ten Tribes during the raigne of As A.

🝇 N the raigne of 🎻 a, the Kingdome of Ifrael felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten Tribes unto their former alleageance to the house of David, if the wissome of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Ierobeam had, in his latter dayes, the sentence of heauie vengeance laied vpon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the same Prophet which had foretold the diufsion of I/rael, for the finne of Salomon, and his raigne ouer the ten Tribes. One fonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom only God found so much pietie, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Familie) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable tessimonie of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and largentation at his death; and (wherein hee was most happie) the fauourable approbation of God himfelfe.

After the loife of this good sonne, the vngodly father was soone taken away: a miscrable creature, so conscious of his vile vnthankefulnesse to God, that he durst 20 not fuffer his owne name to be vsed in consulting with an holy Prophet, affured of the ruine hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extreme hatred; yet for bearing to destroy those accursed Idolls that wrought his confusion. So loath hee was to forfake his worldly wisedome, when the world was readie to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memorie excepted.

Wadab the sonne of Ieroboam, raigned in the second and third yeares of Asa, which are reckoned as two yeares, though indeede his fathers last yeare of two and twentie didrunne along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of A/4, whose third yeare was the first of Baasha; so that perhaps this Nadab injoyed not his Kingdome one whole yeare. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sen-20 tence. It seemes that he little seared the judgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that was secure of his owne estate, hee armed all Israel against the Philistims, and befreged one of their Townes. There (whether it were fo, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to minde their gricuous losse of fine hundred thousand vnder leroboam, counting it an vnluckie familie to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, hee exasperated them) flaine he was by Bsassa, whom the Armie did willingly accept for King in his stead. Bassha was no sooner proclaimed King, than hee began to take order with the house of leraboum, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercie, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods 40 will to haue it so, it is cuident, by his continuing in the same forme of Idolatric which Ieroboam had begunne. Wherefore hee received the same sentence from God that had been elaid vpon Ierobeam; which was executed vpon him also in the same fort. Hee beganne to infest Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was directed from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Countrie, destroying all the Land of Nephthalim. Foure and twentie yeares heer aigned: and then dying, left the Crowne to Ela his sonne; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the sonne of Ierobeam had done, two yeares current, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. He sent an Armie against Gibbethon, the same Towne of the Philistims, before which Nadab 50 the sonne of Ieroboam perished; but he sate at home the whilft, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby hee gaue such advantage against himselse, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remayning with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so diffolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baafha had found, by doing as Baafha had done. Wherefore he did fet vp-on Elain his drunkennesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled himfelfe King of Israel: and began his raigne with massacring all the house of Baasha; ex. tending his crueltie not only to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcomed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in steade of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they faluted King, they (quitting the fiege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seeme to have forced. Zimri santing ftrength to defend the Citle, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling aliue into his enemies hands, did fet fire on the Palace: confuming it and himfelfe together to 10 ashes. Seuen dayes he is said to have raigned : accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an Idolater, 17.1. king in the way of IEROBOAM; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherin to declare himselfe, than the raigne of seuen dayes, and those consumed partly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri, wherby it may sceme, that Zimri had made his partie strong, as being able to set vo a new head, who doubtleffe would neuer haue appeared, if there had not beene readicto his hand, fome strength, not vnlikely to resist and vanquish the Armie which maintayned Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out; I doe 23 not finde; only it appeares that his fide was decaied, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

A conjecture of the causes hindring the revuion of Israel with Iuda, which might have beene effected by these troubles.

WENV man that shall consider the state of Israel, in those times, may justricd with the calamities alreadie suffered under these vnfortunate ly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wea- 30 cient Kings, and revnite themselves with the mightie Tribes of Inda

and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Ala, but rather chose, the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yeelding, or butning him felfe, the other to languilh away, a man for faken: than to have recourse vnto a remedie, so sure, so readie, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were a true, but an idle answere (for his secret will is the cause of all things) vnleffe it could be proued, that he had forbidden Asa to deale in that businesse, as he forbad Rehoboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the 40 restraint laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appeares by the Warre continued betweene Israel and Inda, so many yeares following: wherein Abia so farre prenailed, that he wanne a great battaile, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the second causes, mouing the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new upftarts, rather than to cast their eyes upon that Royall house of Dauid, from which the fuccession of fine Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have beene laid vpon the meane beginnings thereof: To thinke that Omri had prevented his Competitors, in making peace 50 with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not only an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him, which as it might serve alone to proue, that A/a, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which hee professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon the familie and friends of Baasha, (As his mortall enemic) gives manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more justly than he have expected the friendihip of Inda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in fearthing out the reason of this backwardnesse in the ten tribes (which was such that they may seeme to have never thought vpon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes it were not amisse to examine the causes, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, who followed the warres in person, as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if wee looke vpon humaine reason) occa-10 fioned by defire of breaking that heavie yoake of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their defire was to have a King that thould not oppresse them. not to haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Reholoam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediatly cheose Ierobosm in his stead. as a man likely to affoord that libertic vnto them, for which hee had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it feemes) herein altogether deceined. For his affectation of popularitie appeares in his building of decayed townes, and in the inflitution of his new denised idolatry; where he tolde the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile fo farre as to ierusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntarie, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reigne, 20 and in the reigne of his fonne, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtesic of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in fuch cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King that he still retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is clearely apparent, that the whole armie of all Ifrael ioyned with Basilia, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Ieroboams

Now the reigne of Bacha himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) enery way vnfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdome harried by the Sprians; neither did hee winne that one towne 30 of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that businesseto his sonne, who likewise appeares an unprofitable fluggard. Wherefore it must needes be, that the fauour of the people toward the house of B. safts grew from his good forme of Civill gouernment, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboani euer meant to doe. And furely he that shall take paines to looke into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Ifrael and Inda, in administration of initice, will finde it most probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so averse from the line of David; as to thinke all aduerfitie more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that house. For the death of Isaband Shimei was indeed by them deserved; yet in that they suffered it without 40 forme of judgement, they suffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonyah was both without judgement, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings icalousie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrarie instice (vnder which it may be supposed that many were cast away) he would have slaine lerobasm (if hee could have caught him) beforehe had yet committed any offence, as appeares by his confident returne out of Agypt, like one that was knowne to have endured wrong having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Ichoram did vpon his brethren, and vpon fundry of his greatest men; as also localed did so put to death Zachariah, the fonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, even in the court of activities. 53 the honfe of the Lord : and MANASES did fled innocent bloud exceeding much, till be replenished terusalem from corner to corner : and this was imputed to him as another falt; belides his sinne, wherewith heemade Inda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of 2.King. 21.16. Israel we finde no monument of fuch arbitrarie proceeding, vileffe perhaps the words of lehoram the fonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, Goddoe fo to mee, and more alfo, if the head of ELISHAthe, Jonne of SHAPHAT Shall stand on him this day : whereby it is not plaine whether hee meant to kill him without more adoe, or to have him condemned as a false prophet. that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eate their owne children, which he thought a fufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpose to deliuer them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the libertie which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptorie execution of the Kings will For Nahoth did not feare to stand upon his owne right, though Abab were cuenticke for anger, neither was hee for that cause put to death, as vpon commaundement. but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a judiciall forme, 19 which might give latisfaction to the people, ignorant of the denife, though to God

The murther of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Iezabel, an impotent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made, whereby their lives were taken from them; but certaine it is that the people, being idolaters, were both pleafed with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the kings of In.la (fuch as are registred) prooue them to have yied a more absolute manner of commaund, than the Kings of the tenne Tribes. Neither doe their fufferings witnesse the contrarie. For of those which reigned ouer In la, from the division of the kingdom, to the captivitie of the ten tribes, 20 three were flaine by the people, and two were denied a place of buriall amonest their auncestors. Yea, the death of Abazia and his brethren, slaine by Ichn, with the destruction of all the royall feed by Athalia, did not ( for ought that wee can reade) ftirre vp in the people any fuch thirst of revenge, as might by the sodainnesse and vniformitie tellific the affection to be general, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vnleffe we should thinke that the death of athalia, after feauen yeeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memorie of her ill purchasing, than by the present sence of her tyrannicall abusing the government, whereon she had feiled. On the other fide, fuch of the kings of Israel as perilhed by treason (which were feauen of the twentie) were all flaine by conspiracie of the great men, who af 20 pired by treason to the Crowne: the people being so farre from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Sourreignes that (after Nadab) they did neuer forbeare to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good fuccesse of treason, valesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being through'y reuenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zachara, vpon Zimer and Shillam, who traiteroufly got and vfurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the feauen remaine, whose ends how the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeed it is precifely faid of the flaughter, committed on Ahabs children by Iehu, that the people durft not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly afr....!: and the same feare might be in them at the death 40 of Peka, whose historie (as others of that time) is cursorily passed oper. The like may be pronounced, and more abfolutly, of the Kings of England, that never any of them perished by furic of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them, neither was there any motiue viging fo forcibly the death of King Edward and king Richard when they were in prison, as feare least the people should stirre in their quarell. And certainely (how focuer all that the law cals treason, be interpreted, astending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the furic of the multitude hath quenched it felfe with the bloud of some great Officers; no such rebellions, how so were wicked and barbarous otherwife, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soucraine, but 50 rather for bearing the aduantages gotten uppon his royall person; which if any man impute vnto groffe ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truely, ascribe to a reuerent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briwess, who, being loofened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands give affiftance to Inpiter, when all the rest of the Gods conspired against him, is very fitty expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as fignifying, that Monarches need not to feare any courbing of their abfolutnelle by mightie firbiectes, as long as by wisdome they keepe the hearts of the people, who will bee fure to come in on their fide. Though indeed the Storie might very well haue borne the fame interpretation, as it is rehearled by Homer, who tels vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practife, by loofening Briarens. For a good forme of government fufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without affiffance of a laborious Wit, but even against all devises of the greatest and shrewdest polititians: eto uery Sherife and Constable, being fooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening rebell how mightie focuer, can against

This declaration of the peoples love, being feldome found in Inda, makes it very likely, that the rule it felfe of government there was fuch, as neither gave occasion of contentment vnto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection, to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept vsually disarmed. For otherwise it would have been almost impossible, that Athalia the sifter of Ahab, a stranger to the royall bloud of Inds, should by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother have destroicd all the seede of Danid, and vsurped the Kingso dom very neere feuen yeres without finding anie reliftance. Yea when tehoiada the high Priest had agreed with the Captains & principal men of the land to set up Ioalh their lawful King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; he was faine to give to these Captaines and their men, the feares and the shields that were King DAVIDS, and were in the house of the Lord. But wee neede not enter into fuch particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by amore vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the tenne tribes did neuer seeke to 30 returne to their auncient Lords: but after the destruction of their fixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of A/a, admitted a seauenth of a new family, rather than they would consubject themselves, with those of Inda and Bentamin, vnder a more honourable, but more heavie yoake.

So, Ma having scene the death of scauen kings of Ifrael, died himselfe after one and fourtie yeeres reigne, leaving Iehosophat his sonne to deale with Ahab the son of Omri, who was the eight king ouer the tenne tribes.

Of IEHOSAPHAT and his contem-

EHOSAPHAT, who succeeded Ala, was a Prince religious and happie; hee destroyed all the groues, altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and fent fearchers to all places and people wanting infruction; hee recourred the Tribute die vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one hee had filuer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of sisteene thousand 50 and foure hundred. The numbers of his men of warre were more than admirable: for it is written that Alnah had the commaund of three hun-2, Chron.17. dred thousand, lehohanam of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides these, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Turgetiers, and of Archers under Elisda

two hundred thousand, and under the commaundement of Ielozabad a hundred and fourescore thousand: which numbred together, make cleuen hundred and fixtie thousand, all which are faid to have waited upon the King, belides his

That Iuda and Beniamin, a territorie not much exceeding the Countie of Kent. should muster eleven hundred and fixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange. and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. loab in Dauids time found fine hundred thousand: Rehobeam found but an hundred and foure fcore thousand: Abia foure hundred and eight thousand: Alia fine hundred and foure-score thousand: Amaziah inrolled all that could beare armes, and they a- 10 mounted to three hundred thousand: Vzziah three hundred and seuen thousand and fine hundred. Surely, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to Ichofaphat that Moab and Ammon were entred his territorie to the west of Iordan, and that there numbers were manie, hee feared ( to wit ) the multitude, it is not likely that hee would have feared even the armie of Aerxes, if hee could have brought into the field eleuen hundred and three-score thousand fighting men, leauing all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selse to better judgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the / seauenteenth, distributed to seuerall leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thousand under Adnah, & the two hundred and four core thousand 20 under Iehohanam, were afterward commaunded and mustred by Amafiah, Eliada, and Iehosabad: for the groffe and totall is not in that place set downe, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Againe as the aydes which Ichofaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinarie power, fo the Moabstes and Ammonites which hee feared could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which hee that commaunded least among Iehoshaphats leaders had under

This mightie Prince notwithstanding his greatnes, yet he joyned in friendship with Ahab King of Ifrael, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Ie/aphat visited at Samaria, and caused his sonne Ioram to marrie Athalia, this wichabs 30 daughter.

Alab perswaded Iosaphat to affist him in the warre against the Syrians, who held the Citie of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Budites to foretell the successe: who promised him vickorie. But Iehofaphat beleeued nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Ifrael. Hercupon Alchab made answere that hee had one called Michaiah, but hee hated that Prophet, because hee alwaies foretolde of euill, and neuer of any good towardes him. Yet fent for Michaish was to the King, but by the way the messenger praied him to consent with the rest of the Prophets: and to promise victorie vnto them as they did. But 40 Michaiah spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both Kings, which was that God isked who shall perswade A HAB, that hee may goe up and fall at Rannoth Gilcad? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his prophets, and bee in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis. It is not you that speake, but the spirit of your father speakes in you : so in a contrarie kinde did the deuill in the prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Martir vpon this place well observeth, these euill spirits are the ministers of Gods vengeance, and are vsed as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes fometime imploy. For as it pleafeth God by his good Angels, to faue and 50 x deliuer from destruction of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrarie, it is by the cuill that he punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to performe the wil of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a fecond fort of malignant natures, but they are enery-where visible. There are spirits, faith hee, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on fure firokes. In the time of deltruction they how foorth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Mediales having by this his revelation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit nee discovered, was strooken by Zidkiah one of Bials prophets, and by Ashab himfeite committed to prison: where he appointed him to be referred and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaial, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou return in peace the Lord hathnot spoken by me. Neuertheleffe Achab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. to Iehosaphat returned to Ierusalem, where hee was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for affifting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damafeens, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites and Idameans to inuade Iudea: who passe Iordan, and cheampe at Engaddi, and when Iehofaphat gathered his armie, the Prophet lahaziel toretolde him of the victorie, which should bee obtained without any bloud-shed of his part: and so when keholaphat approached, this affembly of nations, the Ammonites and Mosbites, difagreing with the Idumeans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselues: those of Ammon and Moab fet vpon the Idumans, and brake them vtterly, which done they alfoinuaded each other; in which broile Ichofaphat arriving tooke the spoile of 2. Chron. 10.

20 them all without any loffe of his part, as it was foretold and promifed by God. Notwithstanding this victorie, Ielio/apha: forgetting that hee was formerly reprehended for allifting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyne with Ochazias. the sonne of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to ophir, hoping of the like returne which Sclomon had : but as Eliezor the Prophet foretold him, his shippes perished and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was ouer- 2, Chroze,

Yet he taketh part with Ichoram the brother of Ochazias, against the Acabites. with which Kings of Inda and Ifrael the Elémites io yne their forces, not forgetting, it seemes, that the Moabites, affifted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroi-30 ed their armie.

The Mosbiges, subjects to David and Salomon, for faking the Kings of Juda, gave themselues for vassals to Ierobasm, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Ichab: but 10/aphat, notwithstanding the Idolatrie of his Colleague, vet as it seemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to bee auenged of the Cashites for their defection from Inda to Ifrael, as also because they had lately joyned themfeines with the Syrians against Iofaphat, and thirdly to punish their double rebellion who first forsooke Inda and now Ifract.

Both Kings resoluted to passe by the way of Idumes, thereby the better to assure that nation, for wee finde that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field 40 together at Engaddi against teholaphat: But whether they had then declared themfelues against Tehosaphat, it is not certaine, for in the 2. of Chroniel. 11. vers. 8. it is written that in the time of Ichoram, the sonne of Ichaphat, Edom rebelled, and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomites, when they were flaine by Moub and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to joyne themselves with the armie of Inda. For that they were numbred among the enemies of Iofaphat it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20 and as plaine r. 2.0. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Ichofaphars death. Now in the paffage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinarie heat of the yeere, or whether the Idumeans ha-50 uing a purpose to rebell missed the armie of suda and sfrael with intent to infeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they failered the fame, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Crafiw and M. Accounts did in their Parthirm expeditions; and had, in all likelihood, vtterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water fprang, by which not onely tehofaphat and his armie, but

The miserable iffue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his sonne, or the sonne of the King of Edom, for facrifice on the rampire of his owne Citic, I have alreadie written in the life of tel. or am among the Kings of Ifrael. 1ehofaphat reigned twentie fine yeeres and died, he was buried in the valley of Iehofaphat, and a part of the Prramis fet ouer his graue is yet to be feene, faith Brochard. That IEHORAM was made King fundry times.

EHORAM the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Iuda began to reigne at thirtic two yeeres of age, and lived vntill hee was fourtie yeeres olde, being eight yeeres a King: but of these eight yeeres, which leheram is said to have reigned, foure are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Abab, left this Ieho: an: King in his stead, as Ahab did his sonne Ahazia. This appeares by the feuerall beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Iehorams kings 4G of Israel and Iuda, and to Abazia the eldest sonne of Ahab. For ahazia is faid to haue begunne his reigne, in the seauenteenth yere of Icho Saphat. Iehor am the brother of Ahazaa succeeded him in the second yeare of IEHORAMthe some of IEHOSAPHAT King of Inda, that is in the next yeere after that Iehoram of Iuda was deligned king by his father; it being (as wee finde elfwhere ) the eighteenth yeere of IEHOSAPHAT himfelie, who went with the Ifraelite against Mab. Hereby itappeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still 'v Jehosaphat, who governed absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his sonne. But in the fift yeare of IE-HORAM King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Iehosaphat, the olde 50 king tooke vnto him, as partner in the Gouernment, this his eldest soune, who was at that time thirtie two yeeres olde, his father being fiftie feauen. Now forasmuch as I EHOSAPHAT reigned twentie fine yeeres, it is evident that his sonne did not reg calone till the eighth of Ioram King of Ifrael. The like regard is to bee had in accounting the times of other Kings of Inda and Ifrael, who did not alwaies reigne precifely fo long as the bare letter of the text may feeme at first to affirme: but their yeeres were fometimes compleat, fometimes onely current, fometimes confounded with the yeeres of their facceffors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeares of those others; with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing leffe needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons mooning lehosaphat either to assume vnto him his sonne as partner in the Kingdome, whileft hee was able himfelfe to commaund both in peace to and in warre, the like having neuer beene done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the seauenteenth of his reigne) vouchsafed vnto him that honour, to refume it vnto himfelfe, or at least-wife to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill fower or flue yeeres were passed. Yet forasimuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may bee a meane to finde some light, whereby wee may more clearely discouer the causes of much extraordinarie bulinesse ensuing. I hold it not amisse to make such conjecture, as the circumstances of the Storic briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to ap-

Wee are therefore to confider, that this King Icholaphat was the first of Re-20 hobosms iffue that euer entred into any streight league with the Kings of the tenne Tribes. All that reigned in Inda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired themselves in vaine, making small profite of the greatest aduantages that could bee wished. Wherefore Iehosaphat thought it the wifest way, to make a league offensive and defensive betweene Ifrael and Inda, whereby each might enioy their owne in quiet.

This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not iffuing from the true roote and fountaine of all wisdom: 2.Civo. and 3. yet as a peece of found pollicie, doubteleffe it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arife, with mutuall fortification of both those 30 kingdomes, against the vncircumcifed nations their auncient enemies. This apparant benefit, being so inestimable a iewell that it might not easily bee lost, but continue as hereditaric from father to fonne; it was thought a very good course to haue it confirmed by some sure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Omri and lifter of Ahab King of Ifrael, given in marriage to Iehoram, who was sonne and heire apparant to the King of Iuda. This Ladie was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queene Jezabel her brothers wife, that thee durit vindertake, and could throughly performe a great deale more in Ierusalem, than the other knew how to compasse in Samaria. Shee was indeede a fire-brand, ordained by God to confume a great part of the noblest houses in Inda, 49 and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisdome, regardlesse of God's pleafure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherin Iuda and Ifrael did adventure equally, but the profit of the victoric should have redounded wholly to Abab: as godly Princes verie seldome thrine by matching with Idolators, but rather ferue the turnes of those false friends, who being ill atfected to God himfelfe, cannot be well affected to his feruants. Before their fetting foorth Ahab deligned, as King, his fonne Ahazia; not so much perhaps in regard of the vicertaine euents of warre (for none of his predeceffors had euer done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Michain 50 (for he despised them) as inuiting Iehosaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein he preuailed.

Probable coniectures of the motiues inducing the old King I E H O-SAPIIAT to change his purpole often, in making his Connelelior AM King.

Anie arguments doe verie strongly proue lehoram to haue beene wholy ouer-ruled by his wife; especially for his for saking the religion of his godly aunceftors, and following the abhominable superfittions of the

That she was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to line a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter shee was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and lifter of two great Kings, not upon base women and meere subjects. The Court of Abab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an infolent man thinke highly of himfelfe, as being allied to honorably; who could otherwise have found in his heart well enough, to despite all his brethren, as being the eldest, and heire apparent to the Crowne, whereof alreadie hee had, in a 20 manner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long hee diffembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be knowne. Like enough it is, that forme fmoke, out of the hidden fire, did very foone make his fathers eyes to water; who thereuppon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his younger brethren. And furely the doings of lebefuphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgouernment of his vngodly fonne. For the good old King was faine to make his progresse round about the land, reclaiming the people vnto the seruice of God, and ap-2. (1002.19.2.4. pointing Iudges throughout all the strong Cities of Inda Citie by Citie. This had bin 20 a needlesse labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by by himselse, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Instice beene percerted, by the power of fuch as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, appeares by the charge which the King did giue to the ludges; and by his commission given to one of the priestes in spiritual causes, and to the steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall ouerseers.

This was not till after the death of Ahazia the sonne of Ahab; but how long after it is vncertaine. For tehoram the brother of Ahazia beganne his reigne (as hath beene alreadie noted) in the eighteenth of Ichosaphat, which was then accounted the second of Ichoram, Icho/aphats sonne, though afterward this Ichoram 40 of Iuda had another first and second yeere, euen in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone, as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So hee continued in prinate estate, vntil the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitic are not fet downe, yet wee may not thinke, that motiues thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Iehoram of Ifrael held the same correspondencie with Ieho-Saphat that his father had done; and made vse of it. Hee drewe the Indean into the warre of Moab, at which time it might well bee, that the young Prince of Iuda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition hee had beene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enter- 50 prize against Mosb did not occupie so much time, as from the eightenth of Iehofaphat, in which yeere that nation rebelled against Ifrael, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the dailie negotiations betweene the two Kings of Inda and Israel, and the affinitie betweene them contracted in the person of Iehoram, might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behauiour of the yonger fonnes, in their elder brothers difgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession, for feare of tumult after his death; or the deepe diffimulation, of Ichoram himfelfe, might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing viuall in mischieuous fell natures, to be as abiect and feruile in time of aduerlitie, as infolent and bloudy vpon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, he demeaned himselfe in such wife towards his brethren, as caused their father to enable them, not only with store of filter, and of gold, and of pretions thinges, (which kinde of liberalitie other Kings 2. Chron. 21.5. 10 doubtleffe had vied vnto their yonger fonnes) but with the custodie of firing Cities in Inda, to assure them, if it might have beene, by vnwonted meanes, against vnwonted perills.

The doings of IEHORAM when he raigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Intra.

Tall this prouidence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequele. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the yonger sonnes of leboseph ; found strong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the fummons of the King their brother, then had he them without more adoe; if they stood upon their guard, then were they Traitors, and fo vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Ifraelitifo Kingdome against them, so that the apparent likely hood of their finall ouerthrow, sufficed to make all for fake them in the very beginning. How focuer it was, they were all taken and flaine, and with them for companie many great men of the Land; fuch belike, as 30 either had taken their part, when the T yrant fought their lives, or had beene appointed Rulers of the Countrie, when Iehoram was deposed from his Gouernment; in which Office they, without for bearing to doe inflice, could hardly avoide the doing of many thinges, derogatorie to their yong Master, which if he would now call treafon, faying that he was then King, who durft fay the contrarie?

After this, lehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innouations in religion; wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to giue way and fafe conduct vnto superstition and idolatrie, nor to prouoke and encourage the people to that finne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, having fuch knowledge of God, and of his detecting that above all other 40 finnes; but he vsed compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is regiftred, to have fet vp irreligion by force.

Whilest hee was thus busied at home, in doing what hee listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and having hitherto, since Davids time, beene gouerned by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themselues a King. Against these Iehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which hee obtained victorie in the field, compelling the rebells to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof hee forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that hee had gotten in beating and killing some of those, whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now beganne the prophecie 50 of Islant to take effect, wherein he fore-told, that Esan in processe of time should breake the voke of Iscob. For after this the Edomites could neuer be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Iuda, but held their owne fo well, that when, after many civill and forraine warres, the Jenes by fundrie Nations had beene brought low; Artipater the Edomite, with Herod his Sonne, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jewes, in the decrepitage of Ifracl, and raigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it selfe.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great Citie within Inda, which in the time of 10/ua had a peculiar King, to rebell against Iehoram, and set it selfe at libertie. Libra stood in the confines of Benimin and of Dan, farrefrom the alfistance of any bordering enemies to Iuda, and therefore fo valikely it was to naue maintained it felfe in libertie, that it may feeme strange how it could cscape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have beene taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and throughly incenfed Lord. The Ifraelite held fuch good intelligence at that time with Inda, 12 that he would not have accepted the Towne, had it offered it felfe vnto him : neither doe we reade that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subjection, but con-2. chron.21.10. tinued a free cftate. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, Because he had sorsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only beene the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to doe as they did: For it was a Towne of the Leuites: who must needes be driven into great extremities, when a religion contrarie to Gods law, had not only fome allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulfine authoritie to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vse of the Temple at Ierusalem (which being deuout men they might feare to loofe by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten renol- 20 ted Tribes by any of the religious Kings, who rather inuited the Israelites thither. and gaue them kinde entertainment : vnder Idolaters they must have beene without it whether they lived free or in subjection. Yet it seemes that private reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than to fuffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein 1ehosaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good old King appointing new Gouernours, and giving them especiall charge to doc instice without respect of persons, ysed these wordes: The Leuites shall be Officers before you; Be of good courage and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seems, that hee encouraged them against the more powerfull, than iust proceedings of his sonne; whom if the Leuites 20 did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect, in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heavie indignation. How it happened that Libra was not hereupon destroied, yea that it was not (for ought that wee can reade) so much as belieged or molefted, may justly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mightie Armies which Ieho (aphat was able to raife, being sufficient to haue ouer-whelmed any one Towne, and buried it under the earth, > approches. But it seemes that of these great numbers which his father could have levied, 40 there were not many whom Ichoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps hee thought it an eatier loffe, to let one Towne goe, than to put weapons into their handes, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loued; are faine themselves to stand in seare of those, by whom they might have beene dreadfull vnto others.

ð. IIII.

Of the miseries falling upon I EHORAM, and of his death.

Hele afflictions not fufficing to make any impression of Gods displeafure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a prophecie in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wives, and his owne body. Hereby likewife it appeares that hee was a cruell Perfecutor of Gods feruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reproue him to his face, as they had done many of his Predecestors, both good and cuill Kings, but were faine to denounce Gods judgements against him by letters, keeping themselues close and farre from him. This Epistle is said to have achronat. 12. beene fent vnto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophecied in his stead before this time, even in the daies of Ieliofaphat. Wherefore 2. Kings c. 2. 60 may be that Elias left this prophecie in writing behinde him, or that (as fome con- 6.3.0.11. iecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that wee reade Elias for Elizeus. Indeede any thing may rather bee beleeued than the Tradition held by fome of the Iewish Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did send this Epistle, a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deniled by Erasmus, or of the Verse that 20 was fent from heaven to St. Giles.

But who soeuer was the Author of this threatning Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible, as the fentence. For the Philiflims and Arabians brake into Indea, and tooke the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they flew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of David, to make any offeniue warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small Territorie, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Ifraelites. The Arabians were likely to have beene then as they are now, a naked people, all horse-20 men, and ill appointed; their Countrie affording no other furniture, than fuch as might make them fitter to robbe and spoile in the open fields, than to oriend strong Cities fuch as were thick fet in Iuda. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be confidered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the art of Warre; and that the provisions which they found, together with the arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skillfull in pursuing their conquest, and going onward in to Regions farre removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it selfe 40 are good horsemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to passengers, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding starke naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnes of their horses, than in any other meanes of relistance, where they are well opposed. And fuch, or little better, may they seeme to have beene, that spoiled ludgain the time of Jehoram. For their Countrie was alwaies barraine and defert, wanting manuall arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philiflims. Out of this we may inferre that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the leaft muster of Iuda and Beniamin under Iehosaph it (wherein were involled three hundred and eightic thousand fighting men ) had beene enough to have driven away farre 50 greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people beene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes iclousie, as in Sauls time by the pollicie of the

It may feeme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his Palace in Ierufalem, but rather seme other house of his abroad in the Countrie, where his wines and children at that time lay for their recreation; because we reade not that they did facke the Citie, or spoile the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Ierufalem it felfe by furprife, the people being difarmed, and the Kings guardes too weake to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore having done what spoile they could, with drew themselues with such purchase as they were able safely to conucigh

The flaughter committed by Iehn upon the two and fortic brethren of Ahazia, 10 or (as they are called elfewhere) fo many of his brothers Sonnes, and the cruell mailfacre wherein all the Royall feede perified (only 10.11 excepted) vader thetyrannie of Athalia, following within two yeares after this invalion of the Philiftims, and Arabians, make it feerne probable, that the fonnes of teboran were not all flaine at once, but that rather the first murther beganne in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heavie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly stricken, vntill it was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, fmiting him with a gricuous disease in his bowells, which left him not vntill his guts fell out, and his wretched foule departed from his miferable carcaffe. 20 The people of the Land, as they had finall cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend forrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of inda, though his owne some succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the fame spirits that had been his Fathers cuill Angells. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous enterring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to prouide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne such Counsellors, of the house of A H AB, as were sittest for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnseasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and oftend the peoples cies, with a stately funerall of a 30 man by them detested : but rather chose to let the blame of thinges passed beelaid vponthe dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her felfe, and hers, which it now did concerne her to auoid. Such is the qualitic of wicked infligators, having made greedie vie of bad imploiments, to charge, not only with his owne vices, but with their faults alfo, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes have made worse, when once he is gone and can profit them no longer. The death of Ieloram fell out indeede in a buile time; when his friend and coiin the Is faelite, who had the fame name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramite; and therefore could have had no better leisure to helpe Athalia in setting of thinges according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the filme hindrance) to helpe her 40 husband, when he was diffressed by the Philistems. Yearather he needed and craued the affiftance of the men of Inda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not feed to well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairely intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (purfuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumflances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reucaled will of God, accomplish neuerthelesse his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselves in the seeming-wise deuties of their owne 50 folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their judgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may fafely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceipts which worldly wifedome dictateth vnto them. For in fuch kinde of vnhappie fubtilities, it is manifelt that # of the raigne of AHAZIA, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne, but the iffue of them partly hath appeared alreadic, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately

CHAZIAS, or Abazia, the sonne of Iehoram and Athalia, beganne his raigne ouer Inde in the twelfth yeare of Iehoram, the fonne of Ahab King of Ifrael, and raigned but that one yeare. Touching hisage, it is a point of more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclu-fion, than that of Torniellus, alleaging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome. Anno Domini 1588. which faith that he was twentie yearesold in the beginning of his Kingdome, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that give him two yeares more. Like enough he is to have beene yong: for hee was governed by his Mother, and her-Ministers, who gaue him counfaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State, he likewife vp. held the league made with the house of Ahab. Hee was much bufied in doing little, and that with ill fuccesse. He accompanied his Cosen the 1/raelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wanne, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Ifrael was faine to aduenture his owne perfon, which scaped not vinwounded. The Towne being wonne was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to bee made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Jehoram King of Ifrael with-drew himselfe to the Citie of Izreel, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his woundes; and Ahazia returned to Ierufalem. It feemes that hee was but newly come home (for hee raigned in all fcantly one yeare, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had 30 taken vp a great part) when he made a new journey, as it were for good manners fake, to vilit the King of Israel, who lay fore of his woundes. Belike athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would have hindred, and therefore fought cuery occasion to thrust him abrode: for otherwise it was but a vaine peece of worke to to leaue his Kingdome, having no other butineffe than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolued at this time to put in execution that heavie judgement, which hee had laid by the mouth of Eliza the Prophet, vpon the house of Abab. And hereunto at this time had hee disposed not only the concurrence of all other thinges, which in mans eies might seeme to have beene accidentall; but the very thoughts and affe-40 ctions of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will fhortly be needfull for explanation of fome difficulties arising, that wee diligently confider and examine.

ò. V I.

How AHAZIA perished with the house of AHAB: and how that Familie was destroicd by IEHV.

He whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizaus the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were fitting together, who calling out from among them Iehu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and annointed him King ouer Israel, rehearing vnto him the prophecie of Elias against the house of

Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that tentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captaines a defire to know his errand, which telm thought meete to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heard all the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him King. For the prophecie of Eliss was well known among them, neither durft any one oppose nimselfe against him, that was by God ordained to per-

Iehu who had vpon the fuddaine this great honour throwne vpon him, was not flow to put himselfe in possession of it, but vied the first heate of their assessions to who loyned with him, in fetting on foote the builnesse which nearely concerned him, and was not to be fore-flowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the renolt might bee carried to Israel, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being forefeene hee marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet fecure. King Jehoram was now so well recovered of his wounds, that hee could endure to rideabroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much feasing, and ioy made, especially by Queene lezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazia comming thither at this time, did make is as well their errand to falute the Queene, Certaineit is, that fince the rebellion of Alab against Israel, the house of Alab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Scuentie Princes of the bloud Royall there were that lined in Samaria; Ichoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had wonne Rameib Glead, which his father had attempted in vaine, with loffe of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein hee received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great betweene ifrael and inda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of fuccesse, to any rebellious enterprizer: fo that now the prophecie of Elia might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembred, than as an unlikely tale, by them that beheld the majesticall face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King 30 of Iuda was entertained, and fortic Princes of his bloud expected.

In the midft of this fecuritie, whileft these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosequution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Nosb, Edom, and other rebells and enemies; or else were triumphing injoy of that which was already well atchieued and the Queene Mother dreffing her felfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in, that . the watchman had from a Tower discoursed a companie comming. These newes were not very troublesome : for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead , to bee readic against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged upon fome notice taken that the enemie would not, or could not flirre. Only the King 40 fent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The meffenger comming to lebu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the Kingas little warning as might bee. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answere, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to bee satisfied, sent out an other, that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Iehn. These dumbe showes bred some suspition in Ichoran, whome the watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the companie drew fo neare that they might, though not perfectly, be differred, and notice taken of Ielu himfelfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loath to discouer any weakenesse, can-50 fed his Chariot to bee made readie, and iffued forth with Abazia King of Indain his companie, whose presence added majestie to his traine, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee had beene more needfull. This could not be done to haftily, but that Iehn was come cuen to the Townes end, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Iehoram beganne to falute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answere, his heart failed him, fo that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow King, he turned away to have fled. But Ichu foone over-tooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, and threw his carcaffe into that field, which, purchased with the bloud of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with bloud of the vniust possessour. Neither did Ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize vpon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where least bel might soone bee aduertised of this calamitie, if thee did not with her owne eies behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose judgement, pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when shee least expected it. But shee, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her selfe readie in all hast, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitour, or at the least to vtter some Apophihegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for euer. Little did shee thinke vpon the hungrie dogs, that were ordained to deuour her, whose paunches the stibium, with which shee besmeared hereies, would more offend, than the scolding language where with thee armed her tongue, could trouble the eares of him that had her in his power. As Iehu drew neare shee opened her 10 window, and looking out vpon him, beganne to put him in minde of Zimri, that had not long inioyed the fruits of his treason, and murther of the King his Master. This was in meere humane valuation fourtly spoken, but was indeede a part of miferable folly, as are all thinges, howfocuer laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her owne Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affested so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much leffe was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Iehu saw that shee did vse the little remainder ofher life in seeking to vexe him; hee made her presently to understand her owne estate, by deedes and not by wordes. He only called to her feruants to know which of them would be of his side, and soone found them readie to offer their service, be-30 fore the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eies of men; of men that considered not the judgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude handes of her owne servants, at the commandement of her greatest enemie, that was yesterday her subject, but now her Lord: and shee perished miserably strugling in vaine with base groomes, who contumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemie sate on horse-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornefully beholding the shamefull manner of 40 her fall, and trampling her bodie vnder foote. Her dead carcaffe that was left without the walls was deuoured by dogges, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murther, and oppression, with slow, but sure paiment, and full interest.

Ahazia King of Iuda fleeing a pace from Ieha, was ouer-taken by the way where helurked; and receining his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all hast) and seeke his buriall in his owne kingdome: and this fauour hee obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Megiddo, and was thence carried to Ieras dem, where he was enterred with his Ancestors, having raigned about one yeare.

Of ATHALIA, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded unto her.

I

Of ATHALIA her vsurping the Kingdome, and what pretences

shee might forg...

2.Chron. 22.5.

FTER the death of Abazia, it is faid that his house was not able to retaine the Kingdome. I which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue guen occasion to diuers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Iosa, who raigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her Sonne, you der whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the bloud, and slew them, that so shee might occupie the Roiall Throne her selfe, and raigne as Queene, rather than liue a Subiect. Shee had before hand put into great place, and made Counfailours who her fonne, fuch as were fitteft for her purpofe, and readic at all times to execute her will: that fhee kept a firong guard about her it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, youn the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to fitire, whatfocuer they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent focuer it be, is feldome or neuer fo shamelesse as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretenses offering themselues; but rather scrapes together all that will any way ferue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not abfurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia when shee saw the Princes of the Royall bloud, all of them in a manner, flaine by her hufband, and afterwards his owne children destroied by the Philistims, beganne euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practife, into faire likelyhoods, those possibilities where with her hulbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might shee give him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilest as yet hee might, 49 for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his Familie, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had alreadie shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Iuda were not vnlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laied vpon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could affure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not alreadic contriue the destruction of him, and all his feede? Wherefore it were the wifeft way to designe by his authoritic, not only his Successour, but also the reuctfioner, and so to prouide, that the Crowne might neuer bee subject to any rifeling, 52 but remaine in the disposition of them that loued him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such perfivations being viged, and carneftly followed, by the importunate folicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the icalous Tyrant thinke that the only way to frultrate all deuises of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the first and eldest.

If Athalia tooke no fuch course as this in her husbands times, yet might shee doe it in her Sonnes. For Abazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his owne high borne-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgate her selse so faire in her wicked pollicie, that shee loftall opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and sonne did afford, of procuring to her felfe some feeming Title; yet could shee afterwards faine some fuch matter, as boldly thee might being fure that none would aske to fee her endence, for feare of being fent to learne the certaintie of her fonne or husband in another world. But I rather thinke that thee tooke order for her affaires before hand. For though thee had no reason to suspect or feare the suddaine death of her sonne. yet it was the wifest way to prouise betimes against all that might happen, whilest her hulbands iffue by other women was youg and vnable to relift. We plainly find that the Bretheren or Nephewes of Abazia, to the number of two and fortie, were fent to the Court of Ifrael, only to falute the children of the King, and the children of the Queene. The flender occasion of which long lourney, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Jehoram that could be growne to any strength) makes it very suspitious that their entertainement in 1ezabels house would only have beene more formall, but little differing in substance. from that which they found at the hand of Iehu. Hee that lookes into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no lesse. Of such as have aspired vitto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust our the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the fword of fuch as claimed by them could give, Historics of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples; and the rule of Salomon is true: Is thereany thing Euclosuse. 30 whereof one may fay, behold this is new? it hath been edireadie in the old time that was before 25. That a King might shed his brothers bloud, was proud by Salomon vpon Adonia; that he might aliene the Crowne from his naturall Heires. Dauid had given proofe: but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practise, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon flew his brother that had begunne one rebellion, and was entring into an other. IEHORAM flew all his brethren, which were better than 2.Chro.21.0.11; he: DAVID purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Ieheram, who had lost much and got-40 ten nothing, thought that he might aliene the remainder at his pleasure; or if Abazia fought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue: either of these was to be answered with the wordes which Iehoiada the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of I O A S H. Behold the Kings sonne must raigne; as the Lord hath Said of the somes of DAVID Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, what socuer it might bee, to the Crowne of Inda; yet is it most certaine that shee had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treacherie, murder, and open violence; and so shee held it fixe whole yeares, and a part of the feuenth, in good feeming-fecuritie.

CHAP-21. S.3.4. of the Historie of the World.

How IEHV fent his time in Ifrael, fo that he could not molest

N all this time lehu did neuer goe about to diffurbeher; which in reafon hee was likelie to defire, being an enemie to her whole Houfe. But he was occupied at the first in establishing himfelse, rooting out the posterite of Abab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Arante i wherein house. The statement of wards in warres against the Aramute, wherein he was so farre ouercharged, that hardly hee could retain his owne, much leffe attempt vpon others. 12 Of the line of hab there were feuentie living in Samaria, out of which number Jehu by letter aduised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselues to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident hee was, which they well viderstood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to relift him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom he had flaine, and being exceedingly afraide of him, they offered him their fernice, wherein they so readily shewed themselues obedient, that in lesse than one daies warning, they fent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were injoyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great facrifice to their God, by which meanes he drew them altogether in- 30 to one Temple, where he flew them; and in the same zeale to God vtterly demolished all the monuments of that impictie.

Concerning the Idolatric denifed by Ieroboam, no King of Israel had over greater reason than lehu to destroy it. For he needed not to seare least the people should be allured vnto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Inda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had received his kingdome by the vnexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Ifraet, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sinne of Ieroboam, that the Kingdome should remaine in his familie, to the fourth generation. But all this would not ferue; hee would needes helpe to peece 30 out Gods prouidence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greediegamester, who by stealing a needlesse Carde to assure himselfe of winning a stake, forfeits his whole reft. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more hee should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, so long practized as was that Idolatrie of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many soeuer they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom to retaine them, hee now for fooke, had not given him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes of holding it.

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengcance of God vpon Ifrael, whereof 40 Hazael King of Damaseus was the Executioner. The crueltie of this barbarous 3. Kingt 8. v. 12. Prince we may finde in the prophecie of Elizaus, who fore-toldit, faying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire, and their yong men shalt thou slay with the sword, and Shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rent in peeces their women with child. So did not only the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie vpon all the Land. For the furie of Hazaels victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one inualion; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrie beyond the River of Iordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those daies the Lord 50 begame to loath Ifrael,) but rather it is likely, that they be moaned the noble House of Ahab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had brauely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had wonne: whereas now they were faine to make wofull thifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Mafter that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemics. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in feruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are in flead of the cafe and pleafure to themselves propounded by contrarie courses, over-whelmed with the troubles which they fought to avoide, and therein by God whom they first for sooke, forfaken, and left vnto the wretched labours of their owne blinde wildome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

of ATHALIAMS Government.

Hese calamities falling vpon Ifrael, kept Athalia safe on that side, giving her leifure to looke to thinges at home; as having little to doe abroad. vnleffe it were so that shee held some correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father King 1/1. who had done the like. And some probabilitie that shee did so may begathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde that this wicked ATHALIA and her children brake up the house of God, and all thinges that were 2. Chron. 24. 12. 17. dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon BAALIM. Such a facriledge, though it proceeded from a defire to fet out her owne Idolatrie, with fuch pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eies, was not likely to want fome faire pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring : in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the tast of that which was formerly thence extracted for his fake.

Vnder this impious government of Athalia, the denotion of the Priests and Le-20 uites was very notable, and scrued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himfelfe, how soeuer the Queenes proceedings advanced the contrarie. For the pouertie of that facred Tribe of Leui, must needes have been exceeding great at this time; all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vtterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they lived, being now very few, and fmall; and the store laid vp in better times vnder godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robberie. Yet they vp-held in all this miserie the service of God, and the daily facrifice, keeping duly their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those daies wherein their entertainement was farre better.

à. IIII. of the preservation of Io As.

EHOLADA then occupied the high Priest-hood, an honourable, wife and religious man. To his carefulnesse it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender fort vp-held in those vnhappie times. His wife was tehoshabeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and sifter to Ahazia, a godlie Ladie and vertuous, whose pietie makes

50 it seeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her accesse to the Court argue the contrarie: but her discreet carriage might more easily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be fuch as fnee was. By her care Ioash the yong Prince that raigned foone after, was conucighed out of the nourserie, when Athalia destroied all the Kings chilcircn, and was carried fecretly into the Temple, where as fecretly hee was brought vp. How it came to passe that this young child was not hunted out, when his bodie was miffing, nor any great reckoning (for ought that we finde) made of his escape, I will not stand to examine : for it was not good in pollicie, that the people should heare fay, that one of the children had avoided that cruell blow; it might have made them hearken after innouations, and so bee the leffe conformable to the prefent gouernment. So 10.3/b was deliuered out of that flaughter, hee and his Nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peraduenture to be cast away, as having no other guard than a poore woman that gaue him suck, who foolifhly doubting that shee her selfe should have beene slaine, was fled away with 12 him into some desolate places, where it was like enough that thee and hee should pethankes due to their joyfull tidings.

Ow concerning this toalb, whose sonne he was, it is a thing of much difficultie to affirme, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the sonne of AHAZIA, feeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might giud that title of Sonne vnto him, in regard that he was his Successor,

I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to anfwere the difficulties, appearing in the contrarie opinions of them , that thinke him  $3^\circ$ to haue beene, or not, the natural I Sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is faid, that \* Curonazion, the house of AHAZIA was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferrethat this south was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For thee perceiuing that the Kingdome was to fall into their handes, in whom shee had no interest, might cafily finde cause to seare, that the tyrannic exercised by her husband, at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now bee reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of 40 It rabel teaching her what might happen to an other Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had beene heire to the Crowne; for sheethat had power enough to make her felfe Queene, could with more case, and lesse enui., haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie shee might haue done her pleasure, and beene the more both obaied by others, and secure of her owne estate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needfull, that shee should be so vnnaturall, as to destroy the child of her owne sonne, of whose life shee might have made greater vse, than shee could of his death; whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little leffe than that of Mothers to

This argument is very firong. For it may feeme incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a side, when as neither necessitie vrgeth, nor any commoditie  $thereby gotten {\it requireth it, yea} {\it when all humane pollicie} {\it doth teach one the fame,}$ which nature without reason would have perswaded.

That I O A 5 did not descend from NATHAN.

thinke him not the sonne of Ahazia, set downe in such fort that it may verie justly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of David, and not from Salomon; to which purpose they bring a Historic (I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, faying that the line of Salomen held the kingdom with 10 this condition, that if at any time it failed, the family of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the fon of David there are that would have him to bee Nathan the Prophet, who as they thinke, was by Dania adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward hee renoked it, as was meets for this 2 athan is reckoned among the fons of Danie, by Bathflua the daughter 1. chron.3.4. of Ammiel, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregorie Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter (Martyr) and after him, Erafmus, and Faber Stapulenfis, have likewise held the same of Io.Ab, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan, and those other brethren of Salomon by the same mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to have been the children of Vria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by fundric 20 of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the only begotten of his mother, doc approoue this exposition: for wee read of no more than two fons which Bathflua or Bathflue adid beare vnto Dauid; wherof the one, begotten in adulterie, died an infant, and Salomon only of her children by the king did liue. So that the rest must needs have bin the children of Vria, and are thought to have beene Dauids onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Joss had not beene the forme of Ahazia, then must that pedegree have beene salse, wherein S. Mathew deriveth him lineally from Salomon, yea, then had not our bleffed Sautour iffued from the loins of Dauid, according to the flesh, but had onely beene of his line by courtesie of the 30 Nation, and forme of Law, as any other might have beene. As for the authoritie of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that loath was not of the posteritie of Salemon, it is enough to say that this was Friar Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath anic fuch matter; but Annius can make authors to speake what he lift.

† III. That IOA'S may probably be thought to have been the sonne of IEHORAM.

N fo doubtfull a case, if it seems lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought vpon, me thinkes it were not amiffe to laid open at once, and perufe together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickednesse of sehoram 2.Kin. 8.v.r.2. the sonne of leheshaphat King of Inda, for which hee and his children perished, rehearfeth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise he would give him a light, and to his children for ever the other doth fay, that for the offences of the fame I E H OR AM, there was not a sonne left him faue I E-HOAH As the youngest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promiseto Danid, that, after those massacres of Ichoram, vppon all his brethren, and of the Phi-.

50 listims and Arabians vpon the children of Ichoram, one of the feed of Dauid escaped; why may it not be thought that he was faid to have escaped, in whom the line of David was preserved? for had all the race of Salomon beene rooted up in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would have beene extant, of an event

fo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord; as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preferuation of the house of David, mentioned in the bookes of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Jehoahas in whom the rotal braunch of Salemon, the naturall, and not onely legall iffue remaining of Dauid, was kept aliue. Wherefore it may bee thought that this Ieash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the yongcit fonne of Ichoram, whose life Athalia, as a stepdame, was not vnlikely to pursue. For it were not casily understood, why the preservation of Davids line, by Gods especiall mercie in regard of his promife made, should pertaine rather to that time, when be-place they are called) fonnes of his brethren remaining aliue, which afterwardes lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one onely did escape. Certainely that inhumane murther which Iehoram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) reuenged voon his owne children; then was not this yen-geance of God accomplished by the Philiflims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwardes profecuted by Iehu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavie judgement laid vpon Ichoram fore if I should affirme to be the same with low, which is called the sonne of Ahs-zia, I should not want good probabilitie. Some further appearance of necessitie there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise have beene. For it was the youngest some of lehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, feeing that hee was twentic yeeres old at the least (as is alreadic noted) when he began to reigne, and confequently, was borne in the eightenth or twentieth yeere of his fathers age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more vnlikely, either that Jehoram should have begotten many children before he was eighteene yeeres old, or that having (as hee had) many wives and children, leffe crueltie of Athalia, in feeking the life of Ions, are cafily cleared, if Ions and Iehoa-has were one. Neither doth his age withfrand this opinion. For he was feuen yeeres old when he began to reigne; which if wee understand of yeeres compleat, hee might have beene a yeere old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his ficknesse. Neither is it more absurde to say that hee was the naturall some of Jehoram, though called the some of Ahazia, than it were to say, as great with the rest, might have served as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahas, that foundeth much more necre to Joas, than to Ahazia, in an English earc, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by fome, skilful in that language) through the diversitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it beso that Abazia himselfe be also called Azaria, and must have had three names, if hee were the same with Iehoahas; in which manner Ioas might also have had severall names; yet because I finde no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will

ture, but leave all to the confideration of fuch as have more abilitie to judge, and lei-not prefume to build an opinion vpon the weake foundation of mine owne coniec- 50 authors have done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that hee was of the posteritie 40 of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answere; which, had it concurred he should vpon the suddaine, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget 30 no more in twentie yeeres following: each of which must have beene true, if this were true that Ahazia was the same Iehoahas, which was his youngest sonne. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causefides Abazia himfelfe there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another 10

Vpon what reasons ATHALIAmight seeke to destroy I O As, if he were her owne grandchilde

TF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the Lext according to the letter, it may be faid that Athalia was not onely blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worshippe of Baalim, but purfued the accomplishment of some naturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her orand-childe, and the rest of the bloud royall. For whether it were so that Athalia 10 (as proud and cruell women are not alwaies chaft) had imitated the libertie of lead 2. Kinco v. 22. bether fifter in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraided by Iehu to her sonne; or whether the had children by fome former husband, before thee was married vnto Tehoram (which is not vnlikely in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and fifter to Abab) certaine it is that shee had sonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be imployed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to fettle the Crowne vpon her owne children, she did seeke to cut off, by wicked pollicic, all other claimes. As for loas, if the were his grandmother, yet the might miftruft the interest which his mother would have in him, least when he came to veeres, it might withdraw him from her deuotion. And hereof (beto fides that women doc commonly better loue their daughters husbands, than their fonnes wives) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for the made him fpend all his time in idle journeies, to no other apparant end, than that the might rule at home; and he living abroad, be estranged from his wife, and entertaine some new fancies, wherein texabel had cunning enough to be his tutoresse. But when the fword of Jehu had rudely cut in funder all these fine denises, then was Athalia faince to goe roundly to worke, and doe as fhe did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwife, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to Ioas, wee neede not feeke into the reasons mooning her to take away his life; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

Adigression, wherein is maintained the libertie of using con. secture in Histories.

Hv s much concerning the person of 1011, from whom, as from a new roote, the tree of Dauid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I confider the nature of this Hiflorie, and the diucrlitie beweene it and others, the leffe, me thinkes,
I neede to fuspest mine owne prefumption, as descruing blame, for curiolitie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in libertie of coniecture. For all Histories doe give vs information of humaine counsailes and events, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can affoord; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times falsly. This we often finde in prophane writers, who afcribe the ill successe of great vindertakings to the neglect of some impious rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemetly, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the leffe wonder, if we consider the answere made by the lewes in Agypt vnto Ieremie the Prophet reprehending their idolatrie. For, how socuer the 30 written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishmens laid vpon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinatly bent vnto their owne wils, that they would not by any meanes be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heauen, as they and their fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vsed to do; For then (faid they) had we plentie of victuals, and were well, and felt no euill : adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, fince they left off the service of that Queenc of Heaven. So blinde is the wisdome of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde our there is no better nor other guide than his owne written wil not peruerted by vaine additions.

But this Historic of the Kings of Israel and Inda hath herein a singular prerogatiue aboue all that have beene written by the most sufficient of meerly humane authours: it fetteth downe expresly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his ouerforwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his 10 his familie, to the securitie of Ieroboam in Izreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the comming of Iehn; but referring all all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his reuealed will: from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this storie, by many great examples, gives most notable proofe. True it is that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histos. Phil. Sid. in his ries that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthin Apollor Poe- Gentleman Sir Philip Sidnie, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwaies true, and notorious actions commonly infufficient to discouer the 20 passions, which did set them first on foote. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed : for to take out of Linie every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Asdrubalin Italie, fitting all to another businesse, or any practise of that kinde, is neither Historicall nor Poeticall) to searchinto the particular humours of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motiues, or impediments of every businesse; and so figuring, as necre to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they indiciously consider the defects in counsaile, or obliquitie in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give affurance, how socuer it may 30 giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnsearchable; and Princes, howsoeuer their intents be seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which pric both into them, and into such as line about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper, or by some subtill miste, they conceale the trueth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselues lie dead, and buried in oblinion, when the preparations which they begate, are conucrted to another vse. The industric of an Historian, having so many things to wearie it, may well be excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where fundry occasions worke to the same end that one small matter in a weake minde is more effectuall, than many that seemes farre greater. So 40 comes it many times to passe that great fires, which consume whole houses or Townes, begin with a few strawes, that are wasted or not seene; when the slame is discouered, having fastned vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Nerves against the Greekes, proceeded from delire of the Persians to enlarge their Empire: howsoeuer the enterpize of the Athenians vpon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs, that the wanton defire of Queene Atolla, to haue the Grecian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had received any injurie; and when he did not yet fo much defire to get more, as to enjoy what was alreadic gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more instly reprehended by fome, or defended by others, for alleadging the vaine appetite, and secret speech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great euils following; this I may boldlie affirme, (hauing I think, in euery estate some sufficient witnesses) that matter of much consequence, tounded in all seeming vpon substantial reasons, have issued indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon, or could well fearch out.

Therefore it was a good answere that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to vilite him in his Popedome, as having long before in his meaner estate, beene his familiar friend. This poore Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to yfe his old libertie of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he verie much wondred how it was possible for his holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning polititian, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compassing of which, 10 all the fubtiltie (faid he) of the most craftic braines, finde worke enough: and therfore the more I thinke vpon the arte of the conclaue, and your vnaptnesse thereto, > the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Friar, dealt with him againe as plainly, faying, Hadft thou lived abroad as I have done, and feene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is mooued; the Pope faid true. For the wifeft of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needes or can. But if we lift vp our thoughts to that supreame governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was

Then shall we finde the quite contrarie. In him there is no vncertaintie nor change; he forefeeth all things, and all things disposeth to his owne honour; Hee neither deceiueth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that law, which hee hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriners, and the profperitie of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction : yea, this broad and headlong paffage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seemeth at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, befides the poisons which infect the foule, many cruell thornes 40 deepely wounding the bodie, all which, if any few cleape, they have onely this miferable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the service of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happinesse, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicitie, yeelding fuch abundance of ioy to the confcience, as doth eafilie counteruaile all afflictions what focuer: though indeed those brambles that fometimes teare the skinne of fuch as walke in this bleffed way, doe commonly laiehold vpon them at fuch time as they fit downe to take their case, and make them wish themselves at their journies end, in presence of their Lord whom they faithfully ferne, in whose presence is the fulnesse of ioy, and at whose right hand are plea-

Wherfore it being the end and scope of al Historie, to teach by example of times past, such wissome as may guide our delires and actions, wee should not meruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Inda and Ifrael, being written by men inspired with the spirit of God, instruct vs cheifly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true telicitie, both here, and hereafter, propounding pounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The feare of the Lord is the beginning of Wildome. Had the expedition of Nerves ( as it was foretold by Deniel) beene written by some Prophet after the captinitie: wee may well beleeue that the counfaile of God therein, and the execution of his righteous will, should have occupied either the whole, or the principallroome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, beene the leffe true, though they might have beene omitted, as the leffe materiall : but the fethings it had beene lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Hiltories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not have done injurie to the facred writings, as long as hee had forborne to derogate 10 from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or litle different, is the buffineffe that I have now in hand; wherin I cannot beleeue that any man of iudgement will taxe mee as either fabulous or prefumptuous, For he doth not faine, that rehearseth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he depraue the text, that feeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reafon , those things, which authoritie alone, without further circumstance, ought to haue confirmed in enery mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the libertie, which I have vsed in coniectures, and may hereafter vse when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor misbesceming an Historian.

d. VII.

Hen Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Isde, and had found neither any forraine enemie, nor domesticall aduerfarie to disturbe her possession, suddainly the period of her glorie, and reward of her wickednesse meeting togither, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of 30 the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to bee concealed, and it had beene very unfitting that his education should bee simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his safetie it was requisite, ) when his capacitie required to have beene indued with the stomach and qualities meete for a King. All this Iehoiada the Priest confidered, and with all the great increase of impietie, which taking deepe roote in the Court, was likely to spreade it selfe ouer all the Countrie, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore hee associated vnto himselfe fiue of the Captaines, in whose sidelitie he had best affurance, and having taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings sonne, hee madea Couenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of 40 the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely, that they should repaire to lerufalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many persualions to win them to the businesse: the pro mise of the Lord vnto the house of David was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawful, and likelie to fucceed as they defired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared. For it was not to bee hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good iffue, neither were the Captaines, and other affociates of Iehoiada able by close working, to draw together so many trustic and serviceable hands as would suffice to manage the busineffe. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Leuites, as had finis 50 flied their courses in waiting on the Diuine service at the Temple, and were now relieued by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart untill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, he had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would bee able to deale with the Queenes ordinarie Guard, and that was enough, for if the tyrannesse did not prenaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leutes were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents were beflowed in the vtter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King David had left an Armorie to the place, which was now emploied in defence

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come wherein this high designe was 10 to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings person; produced him o penly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vsing all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings the Queene was the last that heard any word; which is not so strange as it may seeme; for insolent natures, by dealing outragiously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly loose the benefit of hearing what is to bee feared, whilest yet it may bee preuented, and haue no information of danger, till their owne eyes, amazed with the fuddennesse, behold it in the shape of incuitable mischiefe.

All lerufalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. 20 Some carried home the newes, others ranne forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, vnder the windowes of the Court; were the people running and praifing the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the 2.chron, 23, 12. extraordinarie concourse, and noise, of folkes in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much vnvsuall passion in their lookes, did presently conceine, that somewhat worthie of her care was happened; though what it might bee shee did not apprehend. How socuer it were, thee meant to vie her owne wisedome in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that shee thought it some especials solemnitie vsed in the Diuine service, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and 30 of other denout men, about the towne, might give some presumption.

Many things argue that shee little thought vpon her owne Tragedie; although Tojephus would make it seeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, Shee came to the a Charles 12. people into the house of the Lord (which was neare to her Palace) and that when shee & 13. 62. looked and faw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or King cart, cars great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, sheerent her clothes, and cried Treason, Treason. Hereby it appeares that thee was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place, which when shee found occupied by another, then shee begun to afflict her selfe, as one cast away, and cried out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby shee saw that shee must perish. But that shee 40 came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Iosephus reporteth) and that her companie being beaten back, shee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had shee truely knowne how things went, shee would surely have gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which shee gatit, and hitherto had held it. Certainely if it were granted, that shee, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene meere madnessein her, to enter the place alone, when her affiftants were kept out; but if shee perceiuing that neither her authoritie, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuerthelesse take voon her to command the death of the new 30 King, calling a child of seuen yeares old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom ince saw to becarmed in his desence, may wee not thinke that shee was mad in the most extreme degree ? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would hauetaken effect, in her destruction, had shee vsed the most likely meanes to disappointit: yet wee neede not so cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to fay, that the godly zeale of Iehoiada found more case successe, through her indifcretion, than otherwise could have beene expected; so that at his appointment shee was without more adoe carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no bloud faue her owne was shed in that quarrell; her small traine, that she brought along with her, not daring to fland in her defence.

ð. VIII.

The death of ATHALIA, with a comparison of her and IEZABEL.

Oft like it is, that Abalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Jehoram the Israelite, who did soolishly cast himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, only through his eager defire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet sheeher selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived fuch a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a futable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her hulband; was an Idolatreffe. and a Murdreffe. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that legaled is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them 20 furviuing her husband about eight yeares, did spend the time in satisfying her owne affections; the one vling tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughtie minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchafte body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vinto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the fuddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treason, received sentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her subjection; in execution whereof, texabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia flaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leifure to vexe her proud heart; that of Iezabel, the more indignitie, and shame of 30 body. Touching their buriall, Iezabel was deuoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that shee was buried, as having not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but fuffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument; for shee was a Church-robber. The service of Baal evected by these two Queenes, was destroiced as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priefts of that Religion, flaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who flue them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who feemes to have beene her good friend) pre- 47 tended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Inda. Concerning children, all belonging to lezabel perished in few daies after her : whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; shee had sonnes living after shee was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were flaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthic of confideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it. For if the children of Athalia had beene in Ierusalem when their Mother fell, their death would furely have followed hers as nearely, and beene regifired, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Bad. That Law by which God forbad that the children should die for the fathers, could not have faued these vngracious Impes, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that 50 every man shall die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene professors & advancers of that vile and Idelatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoile of it; likely it is that they should not have escaped with life, if Iehoiads the Pricst could have gotCHAP.22. ten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their deaths so the securitie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very carnestly. For these had beene esecond as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her affiliants in that particular bulinefle of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great Iway in other matters as Princes and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is enident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres against Jehn) absent from Ierufalem; whereby Iehoia a might with the more confidence, aduenture to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

Of IOAs and AMASIA, with their (ontemporaries; where somewhat of the building of CARTHAGE.

Of IOAs his doings whileft IEHOIAD A the Priest lined.

the death of Athalia, the whole Countrie of Iuda was filled with great ioy and quietneffe; wherein 10as a child of seuen yeares old or there-about, began his Raigne, which continued almost fortic yeares. During his minoritie, hee lived under the protection of that Honourable man !eloiada the Priest, who did as faithfully gouerne the Kingdome, as hee had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his auncestors. When hee came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of Jeholadatwo wines, and begat fonnes and daughters, repairing the family of David which was a most worneout. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of 40 the Temple. It was a needfull pecce of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that Holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vegodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vphold the Temple, whome the Temple had vpheld. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeale, that not onely the Leuites were more flacke then he, but even Iehoiada was faine to be quickned by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moles, partly out of the liberalitie of the people: who gaue fo freely, that the Tem- 2.chen.14.v.14. ple, belides all reparations, was enriched with veffels of Gold and Siluer, and with all other Vtenfiles. The facrifices likewife were offered, as vnder godly Kingsthey had beene, and the service of God was magnificently celebrated.

II.

The death of I EHOIADA, and Apollage of IOAS.

Vt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who hauing liued an hundred and thirtie yeares, died before his Countrie could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Incla, as he well descrued, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselues, and all their iffue. Yet his honourable Funerall seemes to have beene given to him, at the motion of the people, it being faid, They buried him in the Citie of DAVID. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no leffe than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that he was as casily comforted after his death, as if hee had thereby beene discharged of some heavie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Inda beganne to flatter their King, he foone forgate, not onely the benefites, received by this worthic man his old Councellour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, year and God himselfe, the author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrie, in 22 fifteene or fixteene yeares, that thirtie yeares, or there-about, of the Raigne of loat, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleare it from that mifchiefe. The King himfelfe, when once hee was entred into these courses, ranne on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertic, to despise the service of God, and a manifest proofe of his being now King indeede, that hee regarded no longer the fowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was onely counterfaited, wherein like an actor vpon the stage, he had striuento expresse much more linely affection, than they could shew, that were indeed teligious.

d. III.

The causes and time of the Syrians inuading Inda in the dayes of IOAs.

Vt God, from whome he was broken loofe, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not eafily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philipims, addressed himselfe towards Ierufalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more, and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for 40 pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Inda had affifted the Ifraelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead . Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Inda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by for bearing to succour I/rad, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extreame miserie, to the furie of Hazael himselse. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stiere vpagainst himselfe a powerfull enemie, before hee had affured the conquest of Ifrael, that lav betweene Ierufalem and his owne Kingdome, if some opportunitie had not promifed fuch easie and good successe, as might rather advance, than any way diffurbe, his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I 50 hold it probable, that the fonnes of Libalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promifing (as metas expensed their Countries viually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his fide; and not to remaine, as loas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Ifrael, but to joyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Iem his potteritie, who, like a bloudie Traitor, had vtterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which he was a fubicet. It this were fo, Hazael had the more apparant reason to inuade the Kingdome of Iuda. Howsocuer it were, we find it plainely, that low was atraid of him, and therefore tooke all the ballowed things, and all the Goile 2. King 12.18. that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the S;rian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get so much readily paide into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the affirance of this, for the pollibilitie of not much more. So Hizae departed with a to rich bootic of vnhappie treasure, which, belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mightie, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave For in the thirtie feuenth of Io.w., which was the fifteenth of lehoahaz he made this purchase; but in the same or the very next yeare he died, leauing all that he had vnto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazaelis, by some, contounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the fecond Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alleaged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly proone, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloudshed or fight; 20 in the later, Das tried the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, hee loft all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was prefent; in the other, he was not named: but contrariw: fe, the King of Aram then reigning (who may feeme to have then beene the Sonne of Haz.iel) is faid to have beene at Damafous. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great that it terrified the King of Jula; The second was a small companie of men, which did animate 10 as (in 2, chron, 24,24) vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as having a very great Armie.

Now concerning the time of this former invalion, I cannot perceine that God forfookehim, till he had first forfaken God. There are indeede some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Iebotada the Prieft, be-30 cause that storic is joyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had beene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had beene afterwards mentioned in that place of the lecond Booke of Kings, or if the Apolitalic of Ioas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was he more vniust in the afflictions of Lothat rightcous man, or the death of Iofias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his indgments upon the house of Ab.b. But it appeares plainely, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent feruice of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were vied in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of IEHOLAD A; Soone achievene 42 after whose death, if not immediatly vponit, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the fix, or thirtie feuenth yeare of this Isas his Raigne, the King falling away from the God of his Father, became a foule Idolater.

And indeede we commonly obserue, that the crosses which it hath pleased God fometimes to lay vpon his feruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have alwayes tended vnto the bette, ing of their good. In which respect, even the fufferings of the bleffed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the fight of Pfal. 1545 the Lord) are to their great advantage. But with cuill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more euen, and more strict account; permitting vsually their faultes to get the flart of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amo-10 rines) till their wickedneise be full: or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to runne on in their wicked courses, to their greater miserie. So bath he dealt with many; and fo it appeares that he dealt with Io.is. For this vnhappin man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if he had strough to exceede the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue fuch avilainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should indure to imitate.

How ZACHARIA was murdered by IOAS.

😪 Vndry Prophets having laboured in vaine to reclaime the people from their superitition, Zacharia, the sonne of Ichoiada the Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God to admonish them of their wicked- to neile, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, wherof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so honourable.

and fonne to a man so exceeding beloued in his life time, and renerenced, that if loss had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemie, yet ought he in common honestie, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have vsed at least some part of the refpect that was due to fuch a person: On the other tide, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountcable benefits, which they had done vnto him, from his first intancie, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most heartic and assured loue of Io.ts, yea though he had beene otherwise a man of very small marke, and not very good condition. The truth is, that 20 the message of a Prophet sent from God, should bee heard with reverence, how timple focuer he appeares that brings it. But this king to.to, having alreadic formed the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zachwia, like as the wicked hufbandman in that parable of our Saujour dealt with the heire of the Vineyard, who faid, this is the heire, come let ws kill him, that the Inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commaunder, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plaine truth, how great focuer that mans deferuing were, that did fo, yea though Gods commaundement required it. So they conspired against this Holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kingsappointment; but whether by any 30 forme of open law, as was practifed upon Naboth; or whether furpriting him by aany close treacherie, I doe neither reade nor can conjecture. The dignitic of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement; though the manner of his death, being fuch as was commonly, by order of Law, inflicted ypon malefactours, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings commaundement, by which he suffered, tooke place in stead of Law; which exercise of meere power (as hath beene alreadie noted) was nothing strange among the Kings of Iuda.

How I o as was flamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

Hisodious murder, committed by an vnthankfull fnake vpon the man in whose bosome he had beene softered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his owne time, and his memorie detefted in all ages; fo had it the well-defuered curfe of the bleffed Martyr, to accompanie it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe swiftly, and heavily vpon the 50 head of that ungratefull monster. It was the last yeare of his raigne; the end of his time comming then upon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to line how he listed, without controllement. When that yeare was expired, the Aramites came into the Countrie, rather as may feeme to get pillage, than to performe any great aerion; for they came with a final companie of men : but God had intended to doe more 2. clrow, 24. 24 by them, than they themselves did hope for.

That 10.15 naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement proofe fufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hawhen hee might have leavied (as his sonne after him did mutter) three hundered thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needes be valiant and make his people know, how front of disposition their King was, when he might have his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of rouers, be tooke a verie to great Armie; fo that wife-men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making thew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expose his person to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere oftentation, and no perill to be feared; he going forth fo flrongly appointed, against so weake enemies. Thus might wife men thinke, and laugh at him in fecret; confidering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisedome of this world is foolithnesse, did laugh, not onely at this vaineglorious King, but at them that thought their King fecure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Io.is met, whether it were by some folly of the 20 leaders, or by fome amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatfocuer meanes it pleafed God to worke, fo it was, that that great Armie of Inda received a notable ouer-throw, and all the Princes were deflroyed: the Princes of Inda, at whose perswalion the King had become a rebell to the King of Kings. As for lost himselfe (as Abuters fis and others expound the Storie) hee was foreig beaten and hurt by them being, (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring our of him an excessive ransome.

And furely all circumstances doe geatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) faith, they exercised upon Ious ignominious judgments; and that departing from him, they difmiffed him in great languor. All which argues, 30 that they had him in their handes, and handledhim ilfauouredly Now at that time, Io.ts the Son of Iehoahas raigned over Ifrael, and Benhadad the Son of Hazael over the Syrians in Damafeus; the one a valiant vindertaking Prince, raifed up by God to reflore the State of his miserable Countrie; the other inferior every way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene these two Princes, promising no other euent than fuch asafter followed, might have given to the King of Inda good cause to bee bold, and plucke up his spirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not beene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehenfion of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with 40 fome shew of warre at his doores, it were easie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good fuccesse hereof, alreadic related, and the (perhaps as inexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following warres against the King of Israel, sheweth plaintly the weaknesse of all carthly might, relifting the power of the Almightie. For by his ordinance, both the kingdome of Inda, after more than fortic yeares time of gathering frength, was vnable to drive out a small companie of enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, hauing so beene troden downe by Hazael, that onely fiftie horsemen, tenne Charriots, and tenne thousand footmen were left, prevailed against his Sonne, and recouered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are eneric where 50 found, and therefore I will not infift you this; though indeed we should not, if we be Godschildren, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our Heauenly fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore fathers vpon carth.

When the Aramites had what they lifted, and faw that they were not able, be-

The beginning of AMAZIA hisreigne. Of IOAS King of Ifrael, and ELISHA the Prophet.

MAZIAS, the sonne of loash, being twentie fine yeares old when his father died, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Juda, wherein helaboured to demcane himfelfe, as his new beginning raigne might beleast offentiue. The Law of Mojes he proteiled to observe which howfoeuer it had been efecretly despised incethe time of Icharam, by 15

many great persons of the Land, yet had it by promition of good Princes, yearnd of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priestes, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plaufible, who did not conforme him selfe vnto it. And at that prefent time, the flaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawne the late King from the feruice of God, being feconded by the death of the King himselfe, euen whilest that execrable murcher, committed by the King sp. on Zecharia, was yet freth in memorie, did ferue as a notable example of Gods juffice against jdolatours, both to animate the better fort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led 20 to fuch an cuill end. He therefore, having learned of his father the art of diffinulation, did not only forbeare to punish the Traytours that had flaine King Janes, but gaue way to the time, and fuffered the dead bodie to be interred, as that of Jehoran formerly had beene, in the Citie of Daurd, yet not among the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda. Neuerthelesse after this, when (belike) the noyse of the people hauing wearied it selfe into tilence, it was found that the Conspiratours (howsoener their deed done was applauded as the handie worke of GOD) had neither any mightie partakers in their fact, nor flrong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the 30 heate of mens affections, being not well allaied, it was easie to diftinguish between their treasons and Gods judgment, which, by their treasons, bad taken plansible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were fuffered to line; which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life the better secured, by such exemplarie justice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly asa Prince well affected to Religon, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteene

As Amazia gathered strength in Inda by the commoditie of a long peace, fo 1925 40 the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre hotly against the warre miles. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his predecessiours had beene, worshipping the Calues of Ierobeam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Iehn, that the tenne Tribes wanted little of being vitterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Ichu and his fone Iehoahaz. But as Godsbenefits to Iehu sufficed not to withdraw him from this politique idolatric; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime Ichonhaz from the same impious course: yet the mercie of God beholding the trouble of Ifrael, condescended vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, even then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their owne abhominable waies. Therefore in temporall matters the tentribes recourred apace but the fauour of God, which had been infinitely more worth, I do not find, nor beleeue, that they fought; that they had it not, I finde in the wordes of the Prophet, faying plainly to Amazia, the Lord is not with Ifrael neither with all the house of EPHRAIM.

Whe-

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Eufba, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperitie of the Israelites under the Raigne of Iois; or whether Ichoshas wearied and broken with long aductfitie, thought it the wifeft way, to difcharge himselfe in part of the heavie cares attending those vnhappie Syrian warres, by laying the burthen upon his hopeful fonne; we find that in the thirtie fenenth yeare 2. King 13, 16, of 10 As, King of Inda, 10 As the some of IEHOAHAZ began to raigne ouer Ifrael in Samaria, which was in the fifteenth of his fathers raigne, and some two or three veares before his death.

It appeares that this yong Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did so to well hulband that poore stocke which he received from his Father, of tenne Charriots, fiftie horsemen, and ten thousand foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thriuer. Among other circumstances, the wordes which he spake to Elisbathe Prophet, argue no leffe. For 10.11 visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus, O my father, my father, the Charriot of Ifrael, and the horfemen of the same, by 1. King 13.1 A which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more steede, than all the horses and Charriots could

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elias, about the first years of Ioram the sonne of Ahab King of Ifrael, died (as some have probably collected) about the third or 20 fourth yeare of this low, the Nephew of Iehu. To shew how the Spirit of Elia was doubled, or did rest vpon him, it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that he did not onely raife a dead child vnto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcasse, which touched them in the graue. In fine hee bestowed, as a legacie, three victories vpon King Ioas, who thereby did fet Israel in a faire way of recovering all that the Aramites had vsurped, and weakning the Kings of Damasco in such fort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

VIII.

Of AMAZIA his warre against EDOM; His Apostasie; and overthrow by IOAs.

He happie successe which toas had found in his warre against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amazia a desire of vndertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour.

His Kingdom could furnish three hundred thousand serviceable men for the wars; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of warre he had very just against the Edomites, 40 who having rebelled in the time of his grandfather Jehoram, had about liftie yeares beene vnreclaimed, partly by meanes of the troubles happening in Inda, partly through the floth and timorousnesse of his father Joas. Yet, for almuch as the men of Inda had in many yeares beene without all exercise of warre (excepting that vnhappie fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wifedome to increase his forces, with Souldiers waged out of sfrael, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of filuer, an hundred thousand valiant 2.Chron. 21. 5. men, as the Scripture telleth vs , though Iolephus diminish the number, faying that 1.6.9.0.10. they were but twentie thousand.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Israel, he 50 was faine to difmiffe, before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill successe, if hee strengthned himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy he gaue them victoric against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were idolatours. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to reuenge, they fell vpon

a peece of Inda in their returne, and thewed their malice in the flaughter of three thousand men; and some spoile, which they carried away. But Amazia with his owne forces, knowing that God would be affiftant to their journey, entered couragiously into the Edomites Countrie; ouer whome obtaining victorie, he slew tenne thousand, and tooke other tenne thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke; holding them, it feemes, rather as Traytors, than as inflenemies. This victoric did not feeme to reduce Edom vnder the fubjection of the crowne of Inda, which might be the cause of that severitie, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the liues of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the loffe of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount Seir, Amazt: 10 tooke, as appeares by his carrying away the jdols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefencible, in that he left no garrifons there, whereby he might another yeare the better have purfued the conquett of the whole Countrie. How focuer it were, he got both honor by the journie, & gaines enough, had he not loft himfelfe.

Among other spoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their Gods, which being vanquilhed and taken prisoners, did deserve well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwife, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this vnworthic 2. chion. 25.14. King Amazia, that hee fet them up to bee his Gods, and worshipped them, and burned incenferenco them.

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet fent from God, hee gaue a churlish 20 and threatning answere; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counseller, and bidding him hold his peace for fewe of the worst. If either the coully stuffe, whereof these jdols were made, or the curious workemanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had raufhed the Kings fancie; me thinkes, hee flouid hauerather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as houshold ornaments and things of pleafure, than thereby have fuffered himselfe to be brinded, with such vnrcasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edamites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, 30 that the same affections caried him from God, vnto the seruice of jdols, which afterwards moved him to talke for oughly to the Prophet reprehending him. Hee had alreadie obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and fent away fuch auxiliary forces as he had gathered out of I/r.sel, which done it is faid that hee was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather affift him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts defire. But with better reason he should have limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esan, having broken the yoke of Izcob from his necke, accordingly as Isaac had foretolde, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amazaa did hope to reconquer all the Countrie of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet fo, that he brought home 49 both profit and he nour, which might have well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wher with men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vse their owne industrie, courage, or forefight. Therefore it is commonly feene that they, who entring into battaile are carefull to pray for aide from Heauen, with due acknowledgement of his power who is the giner of victoric; when the field is wonn, do vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how he got fuch a ground of aduantage, another, how he gaue checke to fuch a battallion; a third, how hee feized on the enemics Canon; enery one strining to magnific himselfe, whilest all forget God, as one that had not beene prefent in the action. To afcribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better fuccesse, than he did , or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Authour of his happinesse; so hee whose meere wisedome and labour hath brought thinges to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankfull, both for the victorie, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeede fo farre from weakneffe is the nature of fuch thankfgiuing, that it may well be called the height of magnanimitie; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of a man advanceth it felfe with confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which fenfe it is a braue speech that Enander in Virgil, vseth to Aneus, none but a Christian being capahie of the admonition,

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dianum

With this philosophic Amazia (as appeares by his carriage) troubled not his head; he had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of Inda, since the time of Jeho (aphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to David: of which honour hee faw no reason why the Prophets thould rob him, who had made him loofe a hundred talents, and done him no pleafure, he having prevailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any mitacle at all. That he was diftempered with fuch vaine thoughts as these (besides the witneffe of his impictic following) 10/ephus doth testifie; saying, That hee despised 10/4/11/19610 20 Go D, and that being puft vp with his good successe, of which neverthelesse hee would not acknowledge God to be the Authour, hee commaunded Ioas King of I-fract to become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their soueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King David and King Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to 10.11 was rather grounded vpon the injurie done to him by the Ifraelites, whom he dismissed in the journie against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the fenfe of a late wrong had more power to ftirre him vp, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long fince, and by him felfe neglected thirtcene or foureteen yeares. Neuertheleffe it might so be, that when he was thus prouoked, he thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would also call old matters into 30 question; that so the Kings of Ifrael might, at the least, learne to keepe their subjects from offending Inda, for feare of endangering their owne crownes. Had Amazia defired onely recompence for the injurie done to him, it is not improbable that hee should have had some reasonable answere from 10.0, who was not delirous to fight with him. But the answere which Joss returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than athistle, showes that the challenge was made in infolent tearmes, stuft perhaps with such proud comparison of nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which Iosephus hath written) betweene a King of Ancient race, and one of lesse nobilitie than vertue.

It is by Sophocles reported of Aix, that when going to the warre of Troy, his far sophocles in Ather did bid him to be valiant, and get victoric by Gods affiltance, he made answere, lace Lon. that by Gods affiftance, a coward could get victorie, but he would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though he did manie valiant actes, hee had small thankes, and finally killing himselfe in a madnesse, whereinto hee fell vpondifgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazaa did vtter fuch wordes, I doe not find : but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of fuch wordes, he was rewarded with successe according. The verie first counsaile wherein this warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a wife Prince indeed at Iernfalem, among his Parasites; but a foole when hee had to deale with his equals abroade. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edonites, a 50 weake people, trufting more in the fire of their Countrie than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Io.ss, who from so poore beginnings had raised himselfe to such strength, that he was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazia discouered much want of judgement, in vndertaking such a match;

a itronger enemie than the King of Iuda, vied that celeritie, which peraduenture had often flood him in good itead against the Aramite. Hee did not lit waiting till the enemies brake in and waited his Countrie, but prefented himselfe with an Armie in Inda, readic to bid battaile to Amazia, and fauc him the labour of a long journie. This could not but greatly discourage those of Inda; who (besides the uing deuoured, in their greedie hopes, the spoile of Ifrael, fully perswading them-felues to get as much, and at as calie a rate, as in the journie of Edom; were fo farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new afforance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomacke enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another Danie, to winne it by the fword. The iffue of which foolehardinesse might easily be foreseene in humane reasons comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the warre. But meere humane wisedome, howsocuer it might foresee much, as the two Armies came in fight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so def-

pised,did (as Iosephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the menof

Inda, that without one blowe given, they fled all away, leaving their King to shift for himselfe, which he did so ill, that his enemie had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Armie which fled, fultained any other lossethan of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Insephius; it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischiese that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazia himselfe should sustaine the wholedisgates might be opened, to let him in and his Armie; threatning him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable catine, with these dreadfull wordes, that he durst doe none other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeelde themselues to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwardes being in weaker state, held out two yeares, against Nebuchadnezzar, was vtterly dismayed, when the King, that should have given his life to save it, vsed all his force of commaund and intreatie to betray it. So the gates of Jerufalem were opened to Jom, with which honour (greater than any King of Israel had euer obtained) hee could not rest contented, but, the more to despight Amazia and his people, hee caused source

Charriot through that breach, carrying the King beforehim, as in triumph. This done, he fackt the Temple, and the Kings Pallace, and fo, taking hostages of Amazia,

Ee may inftly martialle how it came to paffe, that hoss, being thusili polfedion of levulatem, basing the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his owne entire, could bee 60 contented to depart quietly, with a little fpoile, when he might haue feized ypon the whole Kingdom. The raigne of Athalia had given him caufe to hope, that the iffue of Danid might be dispossed for other trowne, his owne Nobilities being the some and grand-childe of Kings, together with the samous actes that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Inda thinke highly of him, who might also have preferred his forme of gouernment, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smoothered therhankes, which were due to the memoric of a swe good ones. The commodite that would have ensued, upon the union of all thet where Tribes, under one Princes.

20 is so apparant, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbad the specifies (as afterwardes in the victorie which Peks the some of Romelia got vpon Adam) to turne his present advantage, to the best vie, weedoe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Isas had beene, in recovering his owne, and winning from his entenie, should forfake the possession of the Insistence of the Adam away the full affurance of so faire a conquest, as the Kingdome of Inda.

But concerning that point, which of all others, had beene most materiall, I meane the defire of the vanquished people to accept the Israelite for their King, it is plainely seene, that entring serusalem in triumphant manner, Joss was vnable to concoct 30 his owne prosperitie. For the opening of the gates had beene enough to haue let him not only into the Citie, but into the royall throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially having sure meanes of compulsion) hee might haue made his owne, when they faw themselues betrayed, and basely given away by him whose they had beene before. The saire marke with this opportunitie prefented, he did not aime at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanely builed, in leuciling at the glorie of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwards have beene corrected well enough, if entring as an enemie, and the wing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the walles, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to shew good will to the in-40 habitants. But when his pride had done, his conctonfineffe began, and fought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most readic to the spoiler, yet should be most forborne. The treasure wherewith Sefae, Hazael, and the Philiftims, men ignorant of the true God & his religion, had quenched their greedie thirst, ought not to have tempted the appetite of 10.15, who though an idolatour, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people faw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands upon the confecrated veffels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whafe chil- intro. 26.13; dren had hereditarie charge of the treasurie) to a sirict account, as if they had beene Officers of his owne Exchequer, they confidered him rather as an execrable Church-

cers of his owne Exchequer, they confidered him rather as an execrabic Churchrobber, than as a Noble Prince, an Israelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that courfe, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the fame phrase) hath wisely avoided; by stealing a few apples, hee loft the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him; and after the respite of a few dayes, might by comparing themselues one to one, perceive his

Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of fo great a Citie. It is not fo casie to hold by force a mightie Towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnaduifed feare. For when the Citizens, not being difarmed, recouer their spirits, and begin to understand their first errour; they will thinke vpon enery advantage, of place, of provisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tilestones, and rather chuse by desperate resolution, to correct the cuils growneout of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischeifes to poyson the bodie, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be defired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weaknette of Péter de Medices, gouerning therein as a 10 Prince, was reduced into fuch hard termes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the eight, who not plainly professing himselfe either friend or foe to the Estate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Manie insolencies were therin committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betweene them and the Townef-men: fo farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their libertie, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intollerable conditions, demaunding buge fummes of readie monie, and the absolute Signoric of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, 20 and tearing them before his face, had him found his trumpets, and they would ring their bels: which peremptorie wordes made the French bethinke themselues, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that monie to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatfoeuer he had of their dominion, and continue their affured friend. So dangerous a matter did it feeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streetes, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and to perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, 30 vfually drawes cueric Citizen to faue his owne, leaving victorie to the Souldier : yet where the people are prepared and refolued, women can quench, as faftas the enemic having other things to looke vnto, can let on fire. And indeed that Commaunder is more giuen to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, for fakes the affurance of a good composition. Linerstie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierufalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly socuer to as might hold himselfe within terusalem, he could not eafily depart, from thence, with his bootic safe, if the Armie of Inda, which had beene more terrified than weakned in the late encounter, should reenforce it selfe, 40 and giue him a checke vpon the way. Wherefore it was wifely done of him, to take hostages for his better securitie, his Armie being vpon returne, and better loaden than when it came forth, for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Belides these impediments, within the Citie and without, serving to coole the ambition of Ioas, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Iuda; it appeares that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elishathe Prophet; who when this Ioas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Ifrael had against Aram, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred vnto the fifth, fixth and feuenth yeares of 10 as: after which time, if any loffes enfuing had blemished the former good successe, ill might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could be have either lent the Indean one hundred thousand men, or meete him in battaile, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the wordes of Elisha, that after three victories, Ioas should finde some change of fortune, and suffer losse; wee must needes conclude, That the Aramite prevailed upon him this yeare, it being the last of his Raigne. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of Ioas his absence, gave such a blow to Israel, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselse into new missortunes, which increased the calamitie, wee may enidently perceive in that which is spoken of Ierobosm his fonne. For it is faid, That the Lord faw the exceeding bitter a flictions of Ifrael, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Ifrael from under the heaven, he preserved them by the hand of IEROBOAM, the sonne of IOAs. This is enough to 10 prone, that the victorious raigne of 10.00 was concluded with a lad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple haltning his miserie and death, as they had done with Selac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Craffus, and other facrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Ierusalem, and courage which they tooke to fet vpon him within the Walls : or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrie, to bid him battaile in open field, and recouer by a new charge the honour which was loft at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought vpon his owne Countrie, by the Syrian in his absence, if not by all of these; Jours was driven to lay aside all thought of 20 winning the Kingdome of Inda; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where hee found a sad well-come, and being veterly for saken of his wonted prosperitie, for sooke also his life in few moneths after, leaving his Kingdome to Ieroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant Sonne.

The end of AMAZIA his Raigne and Life.

CHAP.22. S.10.

Ny man is able to gheffe how Amazia looked, when the enemie had left him. Hee that had vaunted fo much of his ownegreat proweffe and skill in armes, threatning to worke wonders, and fet up anew the glorious Empire of David, was now uncased of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had beene painted. Much argument of scotting at him hee had ministred vnto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtleffe, were very many: for the shame that falls upon an infolent man, seldome failes of meeting with aboundance of reproach. As for Amazia (belides that the multitude are alwaies prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, cuen of those calamities which happened by their owne default) there 40 was no child in all Ierusalem, but knew him to be the roote of all this mischiefe. He had not only challenged a good man of Warre, being himfelfe a Dastard ; but when hee was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common Enemie, to haue him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes hee might fee what spoile there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-fay. The father of this Amazia, was a bealtly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his owne life at so deare a rate, as the Citie and Temple of terufalem. Had he offered; should they have made his promise good? Surely the halle which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very vinfortunate, for by keeping out the Israelite (which was case enough) any little while, they should soone 50 haue beenerid of him, seeing that the Aramites would have made him runne home, with greater speede than he came forth. Then also, when having truffed up his baggage, he was readicto be gone, a litle courage would have ferued to perswade him to leaue his loade behinde; had not their good King deliuered vp Holtages, to fecure his returne, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vexe the heart of this vnhappie King: it had beene well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his faults vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonor. But we finde no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that hee continued an Idolator to the very laft. For it is faid of 2. Chron. 25. 27. him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem; a manifest proofe that he was not reclaimed, vnto his lives end. And certainely, they which tell a man in his aduerlitic of his faults passed, shall sooner bee thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to feeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than ever they had beene. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a 10 heart into him, whereof themselves might alwaies be Masters, wanted not plausible matter to reviue him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Inda, that had beene ouer-come in battaile. David himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leaving it, before the Enemie was in fight, vnto Absalom his rebellious sonne. Many befides him had received loffes, wherein the Temple bare a part. If low might fo enfily have beene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sefae in? As was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessitie of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had he given them any cause of 20 displeasure? It was he indeede that commanded to set open the gates to low; but it was the people that did it. Good feruants ought not to have obeied their Mallers commandements, to his disaduantage, when they saw him not Master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or fuffered in that condition; fo was that misfortune it felfe, in true estimation as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loffe. For had hee beene as hastie to flie, as others were; hee might have escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the bale Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betraied by those in whom hee trufted. Vinworthie creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans wordes, being prifoner, he comanded them to yeeld; having ne- 20 glected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bad them fland to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needes acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lives were saued; the Enemie having wifely preferred the surprise of a Lyon that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Armic of stags, that followed him.

These or the like wordes comforting Amazia, were able to perswade him, that it was even fo indeede. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily finde how to impute this late difaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now 40 concerning fortune, it seemes that he meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in sifteene yeares following (so long he out-lived his honor) we finde not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth be recorded of his government, yet wee may fee by his end, that the middle time was ill spentamong them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking that leffe regard is had of his person, than he beleeueth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a seuere man. For the affected sowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the gravitic of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they live, which are subject vnto oppression, carries a shew of reverence, to 50 him that does the wrong; at least it serves to dazle the cies of vnderlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as have jurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vling it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they doe viually mispend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vaine and deceiuable course; procuring, instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indianation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous confequence; especially when an virable spirit, being ouerparted with high authoritie, is too passionate in the execution of Juch an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amaza thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did hee elfe than striue to make the people thinke he hated them, when of themselves they were ant enough to beleeue, that he did not love them? The best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death, prouided well enough for his owne fecuritie: but who fhould take vengeance; (or vpon whom?) of fuch a murther, wherein enery one had 10 apart? Surely God himfelfe, who had not given commandement or leave vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in thedding the bloud of his anointed. Yetas Amazia, carclesse of God, was carried headling by his owne affections; so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, rose vp against him, with such headlong surie, that being vnabie to defend himselfe in Ierufalem, he was driven to forfake the Citie, and flie to Lachis, for lafegard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceiued against him, and so generall, that neither his absence could allaie the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrie abroade procure friends, to defend his life. Questionlesse, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affe-20 Red to him; yet found he there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Conspiratours (who troubled not themselues about raiting an armie for the matter) sent pursuers after him, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the vimoit Citie of his Dominion Weltward, franding somewhat without the border of Inda; so that hee might have made an easie escape (if hee durst aduenture) into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Ifrael. Therefore it may feeme that he was detained there, where certaine it is that he found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the generall insurrection; the murtherers could not at so good leisure as they did, have carried away his bodie to Jerusalem, where they gave him 20 buriall with his fathers.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of I v D A, after the death of AMAZIA.

T hath alreadie beene shewed, that the raignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel were sometimes to be more than and If act were fometimes to be measured by compleat yeares, otherwhiles, by yeares current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeares of his fathers Raigne', or the then confounded with the last yeares of his fathers Raigne, or the foremost of his Sonnes. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crowner of Juda laie voide eleuen whole yeares: a thing not plainly fet 🗡 downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Iofephus, and therefore hard to bee beleeued, were it not proued by necessarie consequence.

Twice we find it written, that A M A ZI A, King of Inda, lined after the death of I O As 2. Chron. 25, 25. King of Ifrael fifteen eyeares; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazia, was & 2.King. 14-17 about the and of fifteen a reases complete, which traday the ficond (who in the 2-king. 14-13). about the end of fifteene yeares compleate, which leroboam the second (who in the fifteenth yeare of AMAZIA m.is made King over Ifrael) had raigned in Samaria. But the succession of Vzzia, who is also called Azaria, vnto his father in the Kingdome of 50 Iuda, was cleuen yeares later than the fixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is expressed, that Azaria began to Raigne in the fenen and inventieth yeare of I r R O B O A M; the fixteenth 2 King 15.1. yeare of his life, being joyned with the first of two and fittie that hee Raigned. So the Interregnum of cleuen yeares cannot bee divided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the text otherwise than the letter soundes.

Yet some coniectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euch, without acknowledging any voide time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the feuen and twentith yeare of Ieroboam, we should perhaps understand the feuen and twentith yeare of his life; or elfe (because the like wordes are no where else interpreted in the like fenfe) that Azara was cleauen yeares under age, that is fine yeares old, when his father died, and so his fixteenth yeare might concurre with the feuen and twentith of lerobosm; or that the text it felte may have fuffered fome wrong, by milwriting twentie feuen for feuenteene yeares, and fo, by making the feuenteenth yeare of ierohoam to be newly begun, all may be falued. These are the conjectures of that worthie man Gerard Office dor : concerning the first of which it to may fuffice, that the author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that you enerie doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all coppies, if perhaps it were in one :as for the fecond, it may be held with fome qualification, that Azaria becan his raigne being fine yeares old; but then must we adde those eleanen yeares which passed in his minoritie, to the two and fiftie that followed his fixteenth years. which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to avoide an interregram in Inda, seeing that the like necessitie hath enforced all good writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeares, in the Kingdome of Ifrael? The space of time be- 10 tweene Ierobosms death, and the beginning of Zachariahs Raigne, and fuch another gap found betweene the death of Peka, and the beginning of Holea, have made it eafily to be admitted in Samaria, which the confideration of things as they flood in Juda, when Amazia was flaine, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea although the necessitie of computation were not so apparant.

For the publike furie, having to farre extended it felfe, as vnto the destruction of the Kings owne person, was not like to be appealed without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to break forth into fuch extremitie. Wee need not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which alreadic had throwne themselves into such an horrible treason, should 30 afterwards dare to withhold the crowne from a Prince of that age, which being inuested in all ornaments of regalitie, is neuerthelesse exposed to many injuries, proceeding from headstrong and forgetfull subjects.

As for their coniecture, who make Azwia to have beene King but one and fortie yeares, after he came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the text. The best opinion were that, which gives vnto Ierobours eleanen yeares of raigne with his father, before hee beganne to raigne fingle in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not fivallow up almost the whole raigne of 1003, and extending the yeares of those which raigned in Israel (by making such of them compleat, as were only current) and take at the shortest the Raignes of Princes ru- 40 ling in other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: euery man may follow his owne opinion, and fee mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

Of Princes Contemporarie with AMAZIA, and more particularly of SARDANAPALVS.

He Princes living with Amazia, and in the cleaven yeares that followed his death, were 10.15 and 1eroboam in Ifrael; Cephrenes and Olf-50 cermus in Egypt; Sylnius Alladius, and Sylnius Auentinus in Alba; Agamemmon in Corinth; Diagnetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Licedemon Thelectus, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerautha, Amyeba, and some other townes.

But more notable than all these, was Affgrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth yeare of Amazia succeeding his father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, raigned twentie yeares, and was flaine the last of the eleuen void yeares which forewent the Raigne of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Winus, which had held that Empire one thousand two hundred and fortie yeares. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard hee was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behaujour.

In these voluptuous courses hee lined an vnhappie life, knowing himselfe to bee fo vile, that he durft not let any man have a fight of him; yet feene he was at length, to and the light of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media under him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was to incenfed with that beaftly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and firiumg to counterfeit an harlot, that hee thought it great shame to line under the command of so vnworthie acreature. Purposing therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belesis or Belafus a Chaldean, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleased with this prophecie, did promise vnto Belofus himselfe the government of Babylon; and so concluding how to to handle the bulines, one of them thirred up the Medes, and alured the Persians into the quar-20 rell, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the fame cause. These foure Nations armed fortie thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himfelfe, but gathering fuch forces as hee could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answere to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battailes hee carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such feareful termes, that had not Belofus promifed them conflantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken up their Campe. About the same time, an Armie out of Bictria was comming to affift the King; but Arbices encountring it vpon the 30 way, perfuaded to strongly by promife of libertie, that those forces joyned themfelnes with his. The fodame departure of the enemie feeming to be a flight, caufed which through ouer-great fecuritie, was unprepared for reliftance. This ouerthrow did fo weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his wives brother Salamenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himfelfe into the Citic of Winine; which. till new aides that he fent for should come, hee thought easily to defend; it having beene prophecied, that Ainine should neuer be taken, till the River were enemie to the towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Niniue, enough hath beene spoken in 40 our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled that Arbaces (having in two battails ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and flaine Salamenus) was faine to lie two whole yeares before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet hee faw no appearance. It feeemes that hee wanted Engines and skill to force those walles, which were a hundred foot high, and thicke enough for three Charriots in front to paffe vpon the rampire. But that which hee could not doe in two yeares, the Riuer of Tygris did

Sardanapalus to fealt his Armie, triumphing before victorie. But the Rebels being ftrengthened with this new fupply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Campe, made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the olde Oracle, or 50 feeing no meanes of refishance left, shutting up himselfe into his Pallace, with his wines, Eunuches and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith hee and they were together confumed. Strabo speakes of a monument of his, that was in straboles Anchiale a Citic of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citic and Thar sus vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eate in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not only drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and

and drinke, and make merrie, encouraging other, with verfes well knowne, to avoluptuous life, by his owne example, teltifie that his nature was more prone to fenfualitie, than to any vertue beforming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces. when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that sodainiv her flew him with a dagger. But the more generall confent of writers agrees with this Diad. Sic. 1, 2.6.7. relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctefias a Greeke writer, that lived in the Court of Persa, where the truth might best be knowne.

Concerning the Princes which raigned in Affria, from the time of Semiramia, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleeve that they were fometimes (yet not, as Orofius 10 hath it, incessantly) busied, in offensive or else desensive armes yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorne Scenlus, who faith that their names were overpassed by Ctessus; because they did nothing worthic of memorie. Whatsoever they did; that which Theophilus Anticchenus hath faid of them is verie true; Silence and oblinion bath oppressed them.

> CHAP. XXIII. Of VzzIA.

The prosperitie of VZZIA, and of IEROBOAM the second, who raigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes after the death of IEROBOAM. Of ZACHARIA, SAL-LVM, MENAHEM and DEKAHIA.

Zzi A, who is also called Azaria the sonne of Jotham. was made King of Inda, when he was fixteene yeares old, in the feuen and twentieth yeare of Ieroboam the fonne of Io.es King of I/rael. Hee Ierued the God of his father Danid, and had therefore good fuccessein in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth, a Towne that flood neare to the Red Sea, and restored it to Inda. 40 Hee ouercame the Philiflims, of whose Townes hee difmantled some, and built others in fundric partes of their Territories. Also hee got the mastric ouer fome partes of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruites of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Iofephus rehearseth his acts) he beganne with the Philisiums, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armic confifted of three hundred and seuen thoufand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand fixe hundered Captaines. For all this multitude the King prepared flields, and feares, and helmets, and other Armes requifites following therein happily a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policie to vse the service of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the 2, Chron, 21.9. Princes and all the Charriots.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more immportant, than the atchieuements of all that had raigned in Iuda, fince the time of Dauid; fo were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not superior to any of theirs that had been Kings betweene him and Salomon. For belides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of warre with triple interest, hee had the skill to vie, as well as the happinesse toget. Hee turned his lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient to such husbandrie. In other places hee had cattell feeding, whereof he might well keepe great flore, having wonne fo much from the Animonites and Arabians, that had aboundance of waste ground feruing for pasturage. For defence of his cattell and Heardsmen, hee built Towres in the wilderno neile. He also digged many cesternes or ponds. Iosephus cals them water-courses. but in such drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers hee so commanded the water, that none could without his confent, relecue themselves therewith; questionlesse he tooke the onely course, by which hee might securely hold the Lordship ouer all the wildernesses; it being hardly paffable, by reason of the extreme drougth, when the few springs therein found, are left free to the vse of trauailers.

Beildes all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundrie Townes among the Philistims; hee repaired the wall of Ierusalem, which Ioas. had broken downe, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred 20 and fiftie Cubites high.

The State of Israel did neuer so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia prevailed in the South, fo (if not more) Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas, King of the tenne Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories, against the Syrians, he wanne the Royall Citie of Damaseus, and he wanne Hamath, with all the Countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderneffe, that is (as the most 2 761425.3 expound it) vnto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiscouered, So the bounds of Ifrael in those parts, were in the time of this Ieroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had beene in the raigne of Danid.

But it was not for the pietic of Ieroboam, that hee thriued fo well; for hee was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Ifrael, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the successe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites, vnder the feet of those, whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Ichu, to which God had promifed the Kingdome of Ifrael winto the fourth generation, was also tengs now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefits, as it had beene at the beginning. But the finne of Icroboam the sonne of Nebat, was held so pretious, that neither the Kingdome it selfe given to him by God, was able to draw Tehu from that politike idolatrie, nor the miserie falling upon 40 him and his posteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperitie, of Ieroboam the sonne of 10.15, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giver of victorie. Wherefore the promife of God, made vnto Iehu, that his fonnes, anto the fourth generation, should lit on the throne of Ifrael, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that wee, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly geffe at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment.

When Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas, after a victorious raigne of one and sortie yeares, had ended his life, it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his Son, should forthwith haue beene admitted, to raigne in his flead; the Nobilitie of that race having 50 gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne passed by election, must needes have appeared base, and the vertue of the last King, having beene so great, as might well serve to say the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the alreadic confirmed right of a familie so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twentie yeares did paile before Zacharia the Sonne of Ieroboam was , by vniforme confent, received as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calues did stand : yet second instruments of this disturbance, are likely not to have beene wanting, vpon which, the wisedome of man was readie to cast an eye. Probable it is that the Captaines of the Armie (who afterwardes flew one another, so fast, that in fourteene yeares there raigned fine Kings) did now by headstrong violence, rent the Kingdome afunder, holding each what he could, and either despiting or hating some qualities in Zacharia; vntill, after many yeares, wearied with diffention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they confented to yeeld 10 all quietly to the sonne of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twentie yeares, we find by the difference of time, betweene the fifteenth years of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortith (his feuen and twentish concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtith of the same Vzziain the last fixe moneths whereof, Zacharia raigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing teroboam to have raigned with his father eleaven yeares, document off the interregram in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abbridge this Anarchie, that was before the raigne of Zacharia in Ifrael. Yet they leave it twelue yeares long: which is time fufficient to proue that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes, was no leffediftempered, than as is alreadic noted. But I choose rather to 22 follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes raigning abroade in the world, than this doubtfull coniecture, that giues to Ieroboam two and fiftie yeares, by adding three quarters of his fathers raigne vnto his owne, which was it felfe indeed to long, that hee may well feeme to have begun it very yong: for I doe not thinke, that God bleffed this Idolater, both with a longer raigne, and with a longer life, than he did his feruant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Israel was voide. before the raigne of Zacharia; little may suffice to be said of his Raigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King; in which time he declared himselfea worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to instific the 32 iudgement of God, whereby hee was flaine. He was the last of Ieliu's house, being (includincly) the first of that line; which may have beene some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly fuccession; the prophecie having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (belides that Gods promife was extended vnto the vtmost) there was no warrant given to Sallam or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had beene given to Iehu, for the flaughter of Iehoram, and for the gradication of Ahabs house. Zacharia having beene fixe moneths a King, was then flaine by Salliam, who King 15.13. raigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Salliam was, I doe not finde; faue onely that he was a Traitour, and the sonne of one Inbelo, whereby his 40 father got no honour. It feemes that hee was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for himselfe; and now, when all other Competitors were sitten downe, thought eafily to prevaile against that King, in whose person the race of tehu was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong partie: for Tiph fab or Thap fa, and the coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemie and supplanter, then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum received the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Msnahem who raigned in his place.

Menahem the sonne of Gadi, raigned after Sallum tenne yeares. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane, For he not onely destroyed Tiph fab, 50 and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this crueltie beene vsed in reuenge of Zacharias death, it is like that he would have beene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his fathers crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was vsed such long deliberation, that we may plainely discouer Ambirion. Disdaine, and other private passions, to have beene the causes of this beastly

In the time of Menahem, and (as it feemes) in the beginning of his raigne; Pal, King of Affiria, came against the Land of Ifrael; whom this new King appealed. with a thousand talents of filuer, leavied vpon all the substantial I men in his Countric. With this monie the Ifraelite purchased, not only the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne establishment therein : some factious man (belike) having either inuited Pul thither, or (if he came vncalled) fought to vse his helpe, in deposing this ill to beloued King. Infephus reports of this Citerahem, that his raigne was no milder totant locate than his entrance. But after ten yeares, his tyrannic ended with his life : and Pekabia.

Of this Pekahia the florie is short : for hee raigned only two yeares; at the end whereof, he was flaine by Peka, the Sonne of Kemalia, whose treason was rewarded with the crowne of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans treason against himfelfe shall be. There needes no more, to be faid of Alenahem, and his Sonne, fauc that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as wee finde in Iofebbus) 10fibio, like to his Father in crueltie. Concerning Pul the Afgrian King, who first opened vnto those Northerne Nations the way into Palassina; it will thorrly follow in or-20 der of the storie, to deliuer our opinion : whether he were that Belofus (called also Belefes, and by fome, Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were fome other man. At the prefent it is more fit that werelate the end of Vzzia's life, who out-lived the happinesse wherein we left him.

d. II. The end of V zzi A his raigne and life.

S the zeale of Ieheisda, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preserve the linage of Dauid, in the person of tosa; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzii, to bring him vp, and aduance him to be a superior of the superior him to the crowne of Inda, when the hatred borne to his Father A-mszis, had endangered his fuccession. For it is said of Vzzia, That he fought God in the daies of ZECHARIA (which underflood the visions of God) and 2. Chion. 26.5.

when as he fought the Lord, God made him profeer.

But, when he was frong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for he transgressed a- 1. 16. gainst the Lord bis God : and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, won the Altar of incenf. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authoritie, by medling in the Pricits office, whose power had in enery extremitie beene so helpefull to the 40 Kings of Iuda, that meere gratitude, and ciuill policie, should have held back Izzia from incroching thereupon; yea, though the law of God had beene filent in this case, and not forbidden it. How socuer the King forgot his dutie, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgate not to affift them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gauchim to understand, how little to his honor it would proue, that he tooke vpon him the office of the Sonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourescore other Priests, valiant men, but their valour was shewed, only in affilting the high Prieft, when (according to his dutie) hee reptehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. We finde in to cophus, that the King had apparrailed himselfe in Priestly habit, and that hee figure, ear

50 threatned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, valesse they would be quiet. Infephus, indeede, enlargeth the storie, by inferting a great earthquake, which did teare downe halfe an Hill, that rowled foure furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping up the high waies, and spoiling the Kings Gardenin the passage. With this earth-quake, hee faith, that the roofe of the Temple did cleaue, and that a Sunne beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was prefertly infected with leprotic. All this may have beene true; and fome there are who thinks that this earth-quake is the fame, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos, wherein they doe much mille-reckon the times. For the carth-quake spoken of by Amer. was in the daies of Ieroboam King of Ifrael, who died feuen and thirtie yeares before Vzzii; fo that lotham the Sonne of Vzzia, which supplied his Fathers place ingouernement of the Land, should, by this accompt, haue beene then vnborne : for he was but five and twentie yeares old, when hee beganne to raigne as King. There-*. Coron. 26. 20, fore, thus farre only we have affurance; that while V zz 1 A was wroth with the Prings. the leproferofe up in his forchead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all 10 hafte, to depart the place, and to live in a house by himselfe, vntill he died; the rule ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to totham, his Sonne. and Successor. Isiham tooke not voon himselfe the stile of King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Anceitors lay interred, yet in a Monument a part from the rest, because he was a Leaper.

ò. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of V ZZIA; and of Prince; then ruling in Agypt, and in (ome other Countries.

N the time of Vazia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Ioil, Amos, Obadia, and Ionas. It is not indeede fet downe, when Ioel, or obadia, did prophecie: but it the prophecis, who will the prefled, ought to be ranged (according to S. Nieromesrule) with the prefled, ought to be ranged these two bee indeed contemporarie next before them; then must these two bee judged contemporarie with Hofes and Amos, who hard vnder King Vazis. To enquire which of the fefue was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath so painefully beene sought, without reprehen-30 fion; how can be be taxed, which offers to fearch out the antiquitie of these holie Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Ionas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Ifrael; and therefore is like to have prophecied in the daies of Io.e., whileft the affliction of Ifrael wasexeeding bitter; the Text it felfe intimating no lefte: by which confequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies, that concerned the Kingdome of Israel, are now loft. That which remains those him, seemes, not without reason, vinto some very learned, to have belonged vinto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose daies Ninine was first of all destroied. This Prophetrather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all 40 the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias.

2. Chron. c.14.

per Efaiam.

In the raigne of Pacialikewise it was, that Esai, the first of the fouregreat Prophets, beganne to see his visions. This difference of greater and leffer Prophets, is Aug. decimi. Dei. taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustine gives reason of the diffinction) because the greater have written larger Bookes. The Prophet Est was great indeede, not only in regard of his much writing; or of his Nobilitic, (for their opinion is rejected, who thinke him to have beene the sonne of Ames the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lined; but for the excellencie, both of his stile, and argument, wherein he so plainely foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Pasfion, and whole hilloric of our Saujour, with the calling of the Gentils, that he might 50 as well becalled an Enangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wise, That ther impreffu (as Hierome faith) one would thinke he did not foretell of thinges to come, but compile an Historie of matters a readie past.

Boccharis was King of Egypt, and the ninth yeare of his raigne, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Vazia tooke posfession of the Kingdome of tuda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Afythis followed in the Kingdome of Agypt, vnto him succeeded Any/is; and these two occupied that crowne like yeares. Then Sabacus, an Ethiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fiftie yeares, whereof the ten first ranne along with the last of Vzzia his raigne and life. Of these and other Azyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to bee intermedled with the businesse of Iuda.

In Albens, the two last yeares of Ariphron his twentie, the senen and twentieth 10 of Thespeins, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and three the first of Asolylus his three and twentie, made even with the two and fiftie of Vzzia: as likewise did in Alba the last feuen of Siluius Auentinus his feuen and thirtie, together with the three and twentie of Siluius Procus, and two and twentic the first of Syluius Amalius. In Media Arbaces beganne his new Kingdome, in the first of Vazia, wherein, after eight and twentie yeares, his Sonne Sofarmus succeeded him, and raigned thirtie yeares. Of this Arbaces, and the division of the Asyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great uncertainetie in the florie of the Asyrism Kings, who have alreadic found the way into Paleflina, and are not likely to for-20 get it.

3. IIII.

Of the Afgrian Kings, descending from PHVL: and whether PHVL and BELOSVS were one person; or heads of sundrie Families, that raigned a-part in Niniue and Babylon.

Y that which hath formerly beene shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the reft of the Confederates did not only submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authoritic fentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lines. The first example of this his power, was shewen upon Belofus the Ba. Eyionian, by whose especiall aduise and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbases exercised in so tyrannicall manner, as might gine offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had affilted him, or to the generalitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belefus, he yied the counsaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne Grace; allow-40 ing him to hold, not only the Citie and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezeling whereof his life had beene endangered.

In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retaining (as it appeares) only the Soueraignetic to himselfe, which to vse immoderately he did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeede, to haue excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promife, hee deftroied the Cittie of Niniue; permitting the Citizens neuerthelesse to take and carric away euerie one his owne goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of libertie; which 10 he himselfe so greatly loued, that by slackning too much the reines of his owne Soneraignetie, he did more harme to the generall effate of stedia, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enioved, could recompence. For both the Territoric of that Countrie was pared narrower by Salmanaffar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde, in the Scriptures, to have held some Townes of the Ccc 2

Messes; and the civill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselues were glad to see that reformation, which Deserts, the sist of Arbates his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the allyrians grew to be fuch, as might in four foor yeares, if not fooner, both extend it felle vnto the conquell of tirel, and teare away fome part of Meates, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Monues, and subsertion of the collyrian Kingdome, whereof the Callete, vnder Arbaees, had the honour, who may seeme at that time to have kept the allyrians vnder their fubjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at libertie; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who raigning afterwards in Babylon and 12 Ninine, are consounded by some, and distinguished by others a whereby their histo.

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthie man hofeth Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the indgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or haue followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it beneedfull to set down a part the several authorities and arguments of sundriemen, adding somewhat of weight or of clearness one to another; it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse; which I will doe as briefly as Lean, 10 and without search to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addisted to the ene opinion thant othe other; by any sancie of mine owne, but meerely led by those reasons, which vponexamination of each part, seemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, vntill of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belosis was the same King who, first of the Asyrians, entred Palassina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authors with fuch as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is faid, that he was a skilfull Aftrologer, fubtile, and ambitious; that hee got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Affyria: finally, that he raigned 30 eight and fortie yeares, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat phalasar his Sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proofe, could not be gainfaid: for that Author (fuch as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, how soeuer Annius his Authors descrue to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, justifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant vnto no Historica tall. For it is manifest by the relation of 1500 orus (which is indeede the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaees and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardanapalus; 40 and that the Backrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewife other Captaines were with gouernements: but that any third Person was so eminent, as to have Asyria it selfe, the chiefe Countrie of the Empire, bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least apparence is found in any Hiflorie. And certainely it flood with little reason, that the Asyrians should be committed vnto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their owne walls and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Miniue by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie, because thereby the people of that Nation might beekept downe, from aspiring to recouer the Soueraignetie, which elfe they would have thought to belong, as of 19 right, vnto the Scate of the Empire.

Vpon fuch confiderations did the Romans, in ages long after following, deftroy Cartinge, and diffolue the Corporation, or Bodie politike, of the Citizens of Capas; because those two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed oner dangerous each to Rome it felfe, that was Miftris of them both. This being fo, how Twill.contact and the thought that the Affyrians in three or foure yeares had crefted their King. Radhom, or, 2, dome a-new, vnder one Pul? or what must this Pul haue beene (of whose defernings, or entermedling, or indeede of whose very name, we finde no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall part of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in druision of the Prouinces, or by his owne power and purchase very some after? Surely he was none other than Betofus; whose neare Neighbourhood gaue him oportunitie (as he was wise enough to play his ownegame) both to get Affris to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should have attempted to circ vponit. The Prouince of Bibylon, which Belofus held, being (as Berodoius neodas), reports) in riches, and power, as good as the third part of the Perfian Empire, was able to furnith him with all that was requifite for fuch a bufineffe; if that were not enough, he had gotten into his owne hands all the gold and filtuer that had beene in the Palace of Nimue. And queffionleffe to reflore fuch a Citie as Nimue, was an enterprife it for none to take in hand, except he had fuch meanes as Belofus had, which Pul, if he were not Belofus, is likely to haue wanted.

Belides all this, had Pul beene a diffinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assiria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylan and Assistanta, it would not have beene an ealite matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootic a sarre of in 1/2 set, the only action by which the name of Phalis knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pulor Phal, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belosius, Beiefes, and Belessia, (in like manner as to sephus acknowledgeth, that hee, whom the Scriptures called neuero-togenalistic therwise than Darius the Mede, was the Sonne of Assages, and called of the Greekes case. It is supported by another name, that is, Crustures) then is this scruple vetterly temound. For Bishorand Mesopotania did border your Syria and Pelessians: so that Belosius, having settled his affaires in Assages towards the East and North, might with good lessure encroach ypon the Countries that lay on the other fide of his Kingdome, to the South and Weft. He that lookes into all particulars, may finde enery one circum30 finace concurring, to proue that Plm! who invaded Ifinat, was none other than Belo30 fine. Forthe Prince of the Arabianis, who joyned with Arbiace, and brought in of mall part of the forces wherewith Sardamapalus was outerthrowne, did enter into that adion, meerly for the loue of Belofin. The friendlhip of these Arabianis was a thing of mame importance, to those that were to passe out Euphrases with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Province, adjoyning to their barraine quarters, might yearely doe them inestimable pleasures; was not only like to have quier passes through their borders, but their vtmost assistance; yea, it frands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoose have guien him intelligence, of the detruction and civil broiles among the ten Tribes; whereby, as this Passes thousand talents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had solt an heavie

Neighbour of Irobosim, recoured their owne, fetting vp a new King in Damesto, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamash) of the Mobrer Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations diuded by Euphrates hold together in so good termes of friendship: it was ancient confanguinitie; the memorie whereof was auaileable to the Syrims, in the time of Dawd, when the Aramites beyond the River came ouer willingly, to the succour of Inducer, and the Aramites about Damaseo. So Belosus had good reason to looke into those parts; what a King raigning so farreoff as Ximice, should have to doe in 50 Syri, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Emphrates, it were hard to flow.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldars into Palassinta, it may be doubted, least it should seeme to haue ill coherence with that which hath beene said of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes.

For if the Crowne of Ifrael were worne by no man in three and twentie yeares, then is it likely that Belojus was either vnwilling to ftirre, or vnable to take the aduantage when it was faireft, and first discouered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not itrong enough, to feeke after helpe from fome Prince that lav further off; and so the opinion of those that diffinguish Phul from Belofus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we lay, that Belofus did passe the Riuer of Euphrates, as foone as hee found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it feeme that the inter-regnum in I/rael was not follong as we have made it: for three and twentie yeares leifure would have affoorded better opportunitie. which ought not to have beene loft.

For answere hereunto, we are to consider; what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Abaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mightic, betweene the times of Arbsees and Deigees the Medes. Now, though it be held an error of orofine, where hee supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldrans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Enfebrus doe concurre, that the authoritie of Arbaees did reftraine the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull only of it selfe. Now, though fome have conjectured that all Afiria was given to Belofus (as an overplus, belides the Prouince of Babylon, which was his by plaine bargaine made aforehand) in re 29 gard of his high defernings, yet the opinion more commonly received is, that hee did only encroach upon that Pronince by little and little, whilest Arbaces lined, and afterwards dealing more openly got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve yeares betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of 26nahem his raigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Appria, and setting of that Countrie, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupied, belides the reflauration of Ninine, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his raigne, if perhaps he lived to feeit finished in his owne daies. So that this argument may rather ferue to proue that Phal and Belofus were one person; for asmuch as the journey of Phul against Ifrael was not made until Belofus could finde leifure; and the time of 30 aduantage which Belofus did let flip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely in that Pronince of which Phul is called King. Eriefly, it may be faid, that he who conquered Affria, and performed fomewhat vpon a Countrie so farre diflant as Palaftina, was likely to have beene, at least, named in some historie, or, if not himselfe, yet his Countrie to have beene spoken of for those victories : but wee neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Author, neither doth any Writer, facredor prophane, once mention the victories or acts what focuer of the Afgrens, donein those times; whereas of Belofus, and the power of the Childens, wee finde good Record.

Surely, that great flaughter of fo many thouland Afforians, in the quarrell of Sar- 40 danapains, together with other calamities of that long and vnfortunate warre, which ouer whelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and vtter defolation of Ainiue, must needes have so weakened the state of Assiria, that it could not in thirtie yeares space be able to inuade Palestina, which the auncient Kings, raigning in Minine, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belofus to fubdue it; who having once extended his dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interpolition of that Countrey, secure of the Sothians, and other warlike Nations on that fide, might very well turne Southward, and trie his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto ciuile diffention of the inhabitants, and the bordering enuie of the Avabians and Aramtes about Daweles, friends and coulins to the Chaldwans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For these, and the other before alledged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Psil in the Scriptures, ought to be understood of Belefus; cuen as by the names of Nebuchadnever, have the Calede, Artafbafbt, and Abafbuerofb, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the fame, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their owne Countries, haue called Nabopollafiar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath brene written of olde, nor neede to trouble our felues and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once graunted; other things, of more importance, will of themfance early follow. For it is a matter of no great confequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Beselves, or some other man : the whole race of these Afferian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Marclocempadus, and Aabe oldifor (famous for the Altronomicall observations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus or Belefis were that Phal which intuded Ifrael; if he and his posteritie raigned both in Ainiae and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Afar, from whome Salmanafar, Senacherib, and Afarhaddon descended; then is it manifest, that we must seeke Wabonassar, the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other then Saimanafar, who is knowne to haue raigned in those yeares, which Ptolomer the Mathemati-20 clan hath affigned vnto Nabonaffar. As for Merodach, who supplanted Afar haddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all this disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrarie part, will not be fatisfied with fuch coniestures. They lay hold vpon the conclusion, and by shaking that into peeces, hope to ouerthrow all the premiffes, vpon which it is inferred. For (fay they) if Nabonaffar, that raigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanaffar, or any of those other Affyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belofus were fenerall Kings. This confequence is so plaine, that it needes no confirmation. To proue that Nabonaffar was a diffined person from Salmanaffar, are brought such argu-20 ments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworne to hold the contrarie. For first, Nabona far was King of Babylon, and not of Afria. This is proved by his name, which is meerely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanasfars name, is proper to the Affyrians. It is likewise proued by the Astronomicall obfernations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Affyrians, doe thew, that Nabonaffar, from whom Ptolomie drawes that Epocha, or account of times. was a Babylonian, and no Affyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is confirmed by the succeffor of Nabonaffar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his owne language Mero-duc-ken-pad, but more briefely in E/ay his prophetie, Merodach, by the former E/ai 39.1. part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the sonne of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the 40 Jonne of B. dadan, King of Babel, were the Jonne of Mabonaffar, then was Nabonaffar none other then Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanaffar King of Affria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonas and Salmanasar, which in Greeke or Latine writing hath no difference, wee are taught by Sealizer, that in the Hiebrew letters there is found no affinitie therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanaffar carried captine some part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Prozince of Babylon Salmonaffar had getten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Mero lach beganne his raigne oner Babylon in the fixt yeare of Hezelia, at which time Salmanaffir tooke Samaria; therefore, if Salmanaffar were King of Babylon, then 50 must we say that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonassar, were allone man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Tofeph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded vpon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessarie inference.

Touching all that was faid before of Phul Belosiu, for the prouing that Phul and Belofus were not fundrie Kings; tofeph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that have spent their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men he confesset that they were, who by their diligence might have wonne the good liking of their Readers, had they not by mentioning Annius his Authors given fuch offence, that men refused thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answere.

For mine owne part, howfocuer I beleeue nothing that Annius his Berofus, Metalthenes, and others of that stampe affirmes, in respect of their bare authoritie; yet am I not fo faucamilh, but that I can well enough digeit a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good sellowes alleaged in it: I have (somewhat peraduenture too often) alreadie spoken my minde of Annius his Authors: neuertheleffe, I may fay here againe, that where other Histories are filent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and ferueth to explaine or inlarge it without improbabilities,

Neither indeede are those honest and paintfull men (as Scaliger termes them. meaning, if I mittake him not, good filly fellowes) who fet downe the Attract Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylen, taking Pul for Belefus, and Salm: nassar for Nabonassar, such Writers as a man should be assamed or vinwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though difliking him ingenerall) Gerard Mercator is not fo flight a Chronologer, that hee should be an laughed out of dores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betweene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and fee whether they be of fuch force, ascannot either be refifted or avoided. It will eafily be granted, that Nabona far was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Africa, some men doubt whether Scaligers reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabenassar be a Chaldwan name, and Salmanassar an Asyrian; yet what hinders vs from belowing, that one man in two languages might bee called by two feuerall names? That Astronomic flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabenasiar Stal. Cann, 1.3. either an Aftrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himfelfe calls them, Pro- 33 phet.is rescio quos, qui NABONASSARVM Astronomum suisse in sommis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their scepe have dreamt of NANONASSAR, that hee was an Altrologer.

Whether Nabonafar were an Astrologer or no I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negative. But as his being Lord ouer the Chaldrans, doth not prouchim to have been elearned in their sciences; so doth it not prove him, not to have been also King of Asiria. The Emperor Charles the fift, who was borne in Gant, and Pinlip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more karned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, then were any that I read of then living in Spaine, if Spaine at 40 that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vse this as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salman, for or Nabonaffar, did vse the Affyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholers: but it feemes, that he and his posteritie, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by fuch a courfe. As for the two ynanfiverable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me thinks none other than anfweres to somewhat that is or might be alleaged on the contrarie side) one of them which is drawen from the vnlike found and writing of those names, salman if a rand Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is 50 not likenesse of found, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanaffar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Balylon, yet not King of Babylon it selfe: this indeede might bee so, and it might bee otherwise.

alleaged out of the Prophet Efai, concerning Merodach the Sonne of Baladan; and in that which is faid of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the Successor of Nabonaffor, and his beginning to raigne in the fixt years of Hezekia, I findematter of more difficultie, then can be answered in hast. I will therefore deferre the handlang of these objections, vntill I meete with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach lived and was King, Verthat I may not leave too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I here fatisfie him; that how firong focuer this argument may feeme, Seato cerhimfelte did line to retract it, ingenuously confesting, that in thinking Mein heb to be the Sonne of Nabonaffar, he had beene deceived. Now therefore let vs confider, in what fort they have fallioned their storie, who taking Pul to be a diffinct person from Belosus or Belestis, have in like fort, as was necoffere, diffinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Marhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse mine owne want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Diuers, indeede, there are, whom I have feene, that fince lofeph Scaliger delinered his opinion, have written in favour of some one or other point thereof: 20 but Sethus Caluifus himfelfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, De emenditione Temporum, hath not beene carefull to give vs notice, how long Belefus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulaffar, did raigne, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to let downe Baladan, for the same person with Nabonas ar, which Scaliger himselfe renoked. In this case the Fre I must lay downe the plot of these divided Kingdomes, in such fort as I finde it contriued by Angustinas Torwiellus; who only of all that I have feene, fets downe the fuccession, continuance, and acts, of those that raigned in Asprinafter Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belofus, and his Posteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. P. aul, whose Annales were printed the 30 last veire; he appeares to me a man of curious industrie, found judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath received good information, and enriched his workes by inferting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both vsed and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe right vnto Torniellus; but confesse my selfe to have received benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as hee hath much confirmed mee in some things, so would hee haue instructed and emboldened mee, to write more fully and leffe timoroufly in other things, 40 which now I have not leifure to reuife. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared leaft it had ouer hafuly pailed out of my hand, and beene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that inuaded the Vallie of Siddim, and were flaine by Abraham, I finde him aduenturing, as I have C.1. $.13. done, to fav, that they may probably be thought to have beene some pettie Lords;

the contrarie opinion of all Writers not withstanding. But now let vs consider how he hath ordered these last Affyrian and Babylonian Kings.

After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mightie, fought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belosus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Afria, fided with Belofus, and they two prevailed fo farre, that fi-50 nally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betweene Octavian, Anthonie,

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainetie) that Arbaces made himselse Soucraigne Lord of all, and placed the seate of his Empire in Mesia, appointing Belofus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Affyria. But inflort space, that is, in soure yeares, it came to passe, by the just judgement of God, that Phul and Belofus rebelled against arbaces, like as arbaces had done against Surdanspalus, and in stead of being his Viceroyes, made themselses absolute kings. And to this later opinion Tornicius himselse leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is sound in propane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, refoliog to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guesse. Having thus deussed, the more supposition are sourced to the steep in the supposition without any wrong to him, make bold to guesse. Having thus deussed, and and Belofus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, hee orders their time, and their successor, in this manner.

Four yeares after Arbaees, Phul beginnes to raigne, and continues eight and fortic yeares. Theglasphalafar (whole name, and the names of other Princes, I write duserly, according as the Authors whome I haue in hand are pleafed to dissertifie them) fueceeding with Phul, raigned three and twentie. Salmanaffar followed him, and raigned tenne. After him Senaberib raigned feuen: and when he was flaine, Afarbadian his fonne tenne yeares; in whome that Line failed.

The fame time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Allyris, or not long after, (why not rather afore) for foit had beene more likely) Belofits vsurped the Kingdome of Bishon, and held it threefcore and eight yeares at the least threefcore and eight yeares did passe, before Nationally rollowed him in the possession.

To Nabon sfire, whome (with Scalger) he thinkes to be Baladan, are affigued fixe and twentie yeares: then, two and fiftie to Merodach, or Mardocempadan; four and twentie to Ben Merodach: and laftly, one and twentie to Nabolasfor, the father of Nabochodonofor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the original of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly say, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belefin, and contound him with Phul, appeare to me more neerely refembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Torniellus would have conceived two different wayes, by which Phul might have gotten Affiria (for how Belofus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adhæres to the later of the 30 two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the fundaine King of Affyria; or to give him so noble a Province, as would, of it felfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most enlikely to have happened, valesse his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had beene proportionable to fo high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) both he denifed the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arife, Why this Phul, being one of the three that divided all betweene them, was veterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Dinision it selfe, and the civile Warres that caused it, were neuer heard of. Questionlesse, the interver- 46 ting of some Treasures by Belosus, with his Indgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoided; but that either we must confesse, the Dominion given to Phul to have beene exceeding his merits, or else his merits, and name withall, to have Leene strangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Affyrians to recouer such strength in four yeares, as might ferue to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus, it was needlesse to rebell, considering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an oner- 50 great fauourer of libertie) cuen the Medes, that were under his owne Gouernment, to doe what they lifted.

But it is now fit that wee perule the Catalogue of these Kings; not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owner times) but fpeaking of their order and time in generall. It it bee fo vniawfull to thinke, that fome of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well as in his) may bee true, especially sinch, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood, why then is it said, that Phu. did raigne in Affiria eight and fortie yeares? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and judicious Writers haue found this number of yeares, to a gree fitly with the course of things in Hiltorie: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgerie (a squestionlesse he is often guiltie of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probabilitie, he be not belee to use far his owne sake; though for our owne sakes we make vse of his boldnesse, taking his wordes for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) were are vnwilling our schues to be A uthors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Herein we stall haue this commoditie, that wee may without brushing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Anneus, against whom we stall bee fure to hade friends that will take our part.

The raignes of Theglathphalafar and Salmans for did reach, by Anninchis meafine, to the length of fine and twentic years the one, and feuenteene the other;
To media hath'ent off two from the former, and feuen from the later of them, to fit
(as it inited) his owne computation; vling the libertie whereof I spake last: for that 20 any Author, saue our good Metasthenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did raigne, it is more then I have yet sound.
To Senscherhand Ajarhadan, Tornicias gives the same length of raigne, which is found in Metasihenes. I thinke there are not many, that with arrogate so much visto themselves, as may well be allowed vinto a man so judicious as is Tornicias; yet could I wish, that he had forborne to condemne the followers of Annus, in this business, wherein he himselie hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like libertie we finde that he hath yled in measuring the raignes of the Chaldans; stuing up all the space betweene the end of Sardanpalus, and the beginning 30 of Nadonassa, with the three score and eight yeares of Bacsas. In this respect it was, perhaps, that hee thought Balosus might have begunne his raigne somewhat later then Phalison therefore and eight yeares would seeme a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he took posselfson of it. But how is any whit of his age aboved by thorning his raigne, seeing his lifereacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver. Indeede, eight and fortie yeares had beene somewhat of the most, considering that hee seemes by the storie to have beene little selfe, at such time as hee joyned with Abouts; and therefore the addition of twentie yeares did well described the note (which Terniellus aduisedly gives) that if his raigne extended 40 not to farre, then the raigne of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, with Nadonassas.

I neither doereprehend the boldnesse of Torniesses, inconjecturing, nor the modesse of Seedinger and Sessions, a lassions, in sorbearing to set downess war antable, such things as depend only youn likelihood. For things whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, must be described in Historie, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries whereof as yet there is made no true discourse; that is, either by leauing some part blanke, or by inserting the Land of Pigmics, Rocks of loadesson, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Rivers, and other particularities, aggreeable to common report, though many times controlled by follow-some greaterinee, and sound contrair to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allowes not such libertie to a Describer, as that which ariests from the remeditesse oblinion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet sairts Neg, fernidis Pars inclusa caloribus Orlundi, nec Borea finitimum latus, Durataq, (ole Nines, Atercatorem abigunt : horrida callidi Vincunt aquora Nauite.

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne snow That freezing to the ground doth grow, The subject Regions can fence, And keepe the greedie Merchant thence. The fubtile Shipmen way will finde, Storme neuer fo the Seas with winder

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe ferue only to milleade fuch discouerers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angric curses, or well deserved scorne; but to keepe their owne credit, they cannot ferue alwaics. To which purpose I remember a pretie jeast of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthic Spanish Gentleman, who had been comploied by his King in planting a Colonic vpon the Streights of Mogellan: for when I 20 asked him, being then my Prisoner, some question about an Iland in those streights, which me thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to bee called the Painters wines Iland; faying, That whilest the fellow drew that Mappe, his wife sitting by, defired him to put in one Countrie for her; that free, in imagination, might have an Iland of her owne. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we neede not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be feared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themfelues to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if fome good Copie of an ancient Author could be found, thewing (if wee haue it not aircadie) the perfect truth of these vicertaineties? would it be more shame to have beleeved 39 in the meane while, Annius or Torniellus, than to have believed nothing. Here I will not fay, that the credit, which we give to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of those Authors whose names hee pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authoritie, I had rather trust Scaliger or Terniellus, than Annius; yet him than them, if his affertion be more probable, and more agreeable to appround Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it feemes to me; it having moreouer gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanely learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as haue once gotten the credit of being generall, fo to deale as Pacunias in 40 Capua did with the multitude, finding them delirous to put all the Senators of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senators vp within the State-house, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtayning thus much, that none of them should perish, vntill the Commonaltie had both pronounced him worthie of death, and eleeted a better in his place. The condemnation was haftie; for as fast as every name was read, all the Towne cryed, Let him die : but the execution required more leifure, for in substituting another, some notorious vice of the Person, or basenesse of his condition, or infufficiencie of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered to be rejected: fo that finding the worse and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old flould be kept for lack of better. 50

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they beganne,

Fter this division of the Affgrian Empire, followes the instauration. of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the raigne of the same King Vazia, and in his one and fiftieth yeare. It is, I know, the general opinion, that these games were chablished by Iphitus, in the first of Intham : yet is not that opinion fo generall, but that Authors, waigh-to tie enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things vnto the sacred Hiltorie, which are found in prophane Authors, wee should not bee too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that fetting in due order thefe beginnings of accompts, we joyne them to matters of Ifrael and Inda, where occation requires.

Their Olympian games and exercises of activitie, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his bodie They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwife Pifa, neare va-20 to Elis; where also tupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. Thele games were exercifed from cuery fourth yeare compleat, in the plaines of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnefus, neare the River Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeares, Aut. Gell. 1. 2.3 till Iphitus by aduife from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Lyourgus the explus. Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Gracians, till Pier, or of Hermitian of Thesis Continued by the Gracians, till Pier, or of the resistance of the state of the raigne of Theodofius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus: other thinke that they were diffolued under Conflantine the Great.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Gracian times, and their stories, to be 30 certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Plinie gives Plinie 36.04; little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the raigne of Cyrus, who beganne in the fine and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eufebius Out of Diodore, Ceflor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the seuen wife Gracians flourished. For Solon had speech with Crass, and Crass was overthrown and taken by Cress.

Many patient and piercing braines have laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these olympiads, namely to set them in the true yeare of the World, and the raigne of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that h of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly jumpe in particulars thereon depending.

Cell against Inlian, and Didymus, beginne the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Ofasor Azaruh.

Enfebrus who is contrarie to himfelfe in this reckoning, accompts with those that Enfeb. de Prop. finds the first olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundreth and fixth yeare after Evang. Lio.c.3; Troy, yet he telleth vs that it was in the fiftieth yeare of Vazia, which is (as I find it) two yeares later.

Transfibenes placeth the first Olympiad sourchundred and seuen yeares after Troy, Ermosto, apad reckoning the yeares that passed betweene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnasses, Dio Clem. Alex. dorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus codecled by Eratofthenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his Po-30 fleritie into Peloponnesus, were sourcecore yeares; thence to the Ionian expedition, threeleore yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lyeurgus his gouernement in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the first yeare of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vaine labour it were, to feeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbrane the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vicertaine. Let is fuffice, that by knowing the inflauration of these games, to have been in the source hundreth and eight yeare current after Troy, wee may reckon back to the taking or that Citie, setting that, and other accidents, which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads, mult teach vs how to finde when they beganne.

To this good vie, we have the enfuing yeares, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided, by the same Eratofthenes. From the beginning of the olympics. to the paffage of Xernes into Greece, two hundreth fourescore and seuenteen yeares, 13 from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and fortic yeares. forwards to the victorie of Lylander, seuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leucha, thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Micedon, fine and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole fumme arifeth to foure hundred fiftie and three yeare; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth yeare of Vzzith, we have arguments, grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his raigne, and the death of Alexander; as also you the Alironomicall calculation of fundric Eclipses of the Sunne as of that which happened when 13 Xerxes fet out of Sardis with his Armie to inuade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his raigne as King, before hee was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the first yeare of the fine and liftieth Olympiad, and that he raigned thirtie yeares; they who give him but twentienine yeares of Yull, de Diu. 1.1. raigne (following Herodotus, rather than Tullie, Iustine, Eufebius, and others) beginne a yeare later, which comes an to one recogning. Our trade and four teenth Olympiad. This Build, de Prop. all good Writers, in the first yeare of the hundreth and four teenth Olympiad. This Gauss Lines. a yeare later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander let by Eurg. 1:10-6.3. an good Writers, in the first years of the number shade of the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations doe. For if we rock on vpwards from the time of Alexander, we shall finde all to agree with the yeares of the Olympiads, wherein Cr. 30 rus beganne his raigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to fignifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Crrus, in the first yeare of the fine and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth olympiad, we find two hundred and thirtie yeares compleat: from the beginning of cyrus his Monarchie, which lafled but feuen yeares, we finde compleat two hundred and feuen yeares, which was the continuance of the Perfine Empire.

Now therefore feeing that the first yeare of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the last of the lixtieth olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth yeare from the institution of those games by Iphinus, followed the last of the seuentic yeares, of the 40 captiuitie of Inda, and defolation of the Land of Ifrael; manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seventie yeares, and one hundred threescore and ten yeares more, the last which passed vinder the Kings of Inda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Fazia, as wee haucairea-

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples fake, that which was feene when Lerxes mustered his Armie at Sarels, in the two hundreth threescore and seuenth years of Nationasian, being the last of the threefcore and fourteenth olympiad; leades vs back vnto the beginning of Aerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a faire way through the three core and ten 13 yeares, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so vpwards through the raignes of the last Kings of Inda, to the one and fiftieth yeare of Vazia.

Thus much may fuffice, concerning the time wherein these olympiaels be-

Totell the great folemnitie of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say, that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wraftling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they only contend for the Maftrie in those feats, whereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle-bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exercises, that ferued only for oftentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musitians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable qualitie, to make triall of their skill. Yeathevery Cryers, which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them to should get the honour, of having placed the best part.

The Eleans were Prelidents of those Games; whose justice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Oliue, without any other commoditie following, than the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held fo much, that when Diagoras had feene his three Sonnes crowned for their feuerall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation : Morcre DIAGORAS, non enim in culum afcensurus es; that is; Die DIAGORAS, For thou shalt not clime up to heaven: as if there could bee no greater happinesse on earth, than what alreadic had befailen him. In the like sense Horace 20 speakes of these Victors, calling them,

> Quos Elsa domum reducit Palma calestes.

Herat.Carm.l.

Such as like heavenly wights doe come With an Elwan Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the fongs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prises; but euen graue Historians 30 thought it a matter worthic of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it) the va- Tallin Orator? nnie of the Greekes, that they effected it almost as great an honor, to have wonne Flaces. the victorie at Running or Wraftling in those games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous victorie, or conqueit of a Prouince.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombeon, which doth answere to our June; and what meanes they yield to make the Moneth beginne with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now returne vnto the Kings of Inda, and leave the merric Greekes at their games, whom I shall meete in more serious emploiments, when the Persian quarrells draw 40 the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Hellesbont,

Of IOTHAM and his Contemporaries.

OTHAM the Sonne of Vzziah, when he was flue and twentie yeares old, and in the fecond of Pekah King of Ifrael, was annointed King in 2 (2001), 33) terufalem, his Father yet liuing. He built an exceeding high Gateto the Temple of three (core cubits ypright, and therefore called ophel: besides divers Cities in the Hills of Inda, and in the Forrests, Towers, and Palaces: he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundreth talents, and of Wheate and Barly two thousand measures: hee raigned fixe and twentic yeares : of whom Iosephus gives this testimonie. This is all that I finde of 10tham: his raigne was not long, but as happie in all 10 things, as he himfelfe was denout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelosteus in Corineh: after whome, the Corinthians erested Magistrates, which gouerned from yeare to yeare. And yet Paufanias in his ficond Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Backle, to the time of Cyp/elus, who droue them out.

Teglathphalaffar, or Tiglathpelefer, the fonne of Phul, the fecond of the Babylenians and Allyrians that was of this new race, about this time inuaded Ifrael, while Fekab (who murthered his Master Pekaiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he tooke most of the Cities of Nephialiand Galile, with those of Gilead, ouer Iordan, 20 and carried the inhabitants captine. This Tiglath raigned fine and twentie yeares, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzhemins findes, that with his sonne Salmansfar he raigned yet two yeares longer; which yeares I would not ascribe to the sonne. because the acra of Nabonafar beginnes with his single raigne, but reckon them to Tighlath Phulasar himselfe, who therewith raigned seven and twentie yeares.

Afchylus, the sonne of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archonin Athens, ruled fine and twentic yeares. Aleamenes gouerned Sparta: after whome, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: but therein surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Diodore, Plutarch, Paulanius, and others, witnesse the contrarie. Paulanius affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and raig- 32 ned threescore yeares, and out-lived the Melleniack Warre: which was ended by Theorompus, the fonne of Wicander, his royall companion.

At this time lived Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Affirian Empire, and of the Citie of Minine; which succeeded (fayth tofephus) a hundred and lifteene yeares after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sofarmus and Medidus raigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of A CHAZ and his Contemporaries.

Has, or Achus, fucceeded vnto Iotham in the fenenteenth yeare of Fish, the fonne of Remalis: the fame being also the last yeare of his fathers raigne, who began in the second of the same Peka, and raigned insteam, but not complete yeares. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his sonne for sacrifice before the Idoll Meloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, fet vp not farre from Ierufalem, in a Valley 50 shadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophes, from whence the word Gehenna is vsed for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkatic of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the facrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pitifull cryes of the children might not be heard: which viniaturall, cruell, and deutlish Oblation, terenie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome vpon the tenth of Attather hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuitiens the eighteenth, it co. 19-32appeareth that this horrible inne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abhomination which God hateth. That it was also practifed elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from ludger, diners Authors witnesse; as Virgil in the second of his Aneids, - Sanguine placefles, &c. and Silius, - Poscere cede Deos. Saturne is faid to have brought this custome into Italie, besides the casting of many foules into the River of Tyber, in flead of which, Eercules commanded that the 10 waxen Images of men should be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in fo much that when their Citic was befieeed, and in diffresse, the Priest made them beleeve, that because they had spared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to bee offered, that therefore Saturne had flirred up and firengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be flaine, and offered to Saturne or Saturn, to appeale him : who belides these forenamed Nations had instructed the Rhodisms, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Messe . Energy le. na, of Galatia, with the Massagets, and others, in these his services: Further, as if hee Dom. 1. 1. were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, 20 (25 Acolla writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by Acolla de Hill. the Deuill under this fearefull servitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridans and nat. Somor. 11d.

For the wickednesse of this King Ahaz, God stirred up Rezin of Damaseus, and Pekah the Sonne of Remalsah, King of Ifrael against him, who inuaded Iudea, and befieged Ierufalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, possesh himselfe of Elab by the Red Sea, and cast the Ienesout of it, and rekab flaughtered in one day twelve hundred thousand Indeans, 2. Chem. 28, 6; of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Manfeials the Sonne of Achaz was alfo flaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Gouernour of his house : and Eleanath the se-30 cond person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Ifraelites led away to Samaria: but by the counfell of the Prophet oded, they were returned and deliuered back againe.

As Ifraeland Aram vexed Iuda on the North; fo the Edomites and the Philiftims, who enermore attended the ruine of Index, entred vpon them from the South; and tooke Bethlemes, Aialon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, and Gemzo, flew many people, and chron. 28, carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe environed on all fides, and that his I dolls and dead Gods gaue him no comfort, hee fent to the Affrian Tiglathpilefor, to delire fome aide from him against the Ifraelites and Aramites, presenting him with the silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings a. Kings 16.

Tiglathpilefer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that role in Palalima. His Father having lately made himselfe from a Provinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Affyria, had a little before led him the way into ludea, inuited by Menahem King of Ifrael. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly hearkened to Achaz and embraced the aduantage. As for Belochus himfelfe, he was content to affigue some other time for going through with this enterprise: because (as I have faid before) he was not firmely fetled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treasures of ierusalem, prepared his Armie, first inuaded the Terri-30 torie of Damafeus, wanne the Citic, and killed Rezin, the last of the race of the Adads, who beganne with David and ended with this Achaz. At Damafeus Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar sent it to Vrish the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Ierusalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath possess all Basan, and the rest beyond lordan, which belonged to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manaffe. And then palling the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephrain, and the Kingdome of Ifrael, and made them his Vassalls. And not withstanding that he was inuited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Ifrael, he possess himselfe of the greater part of Iuda, and as it feemeth inforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings the eighteenth it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Albur. or rebelled against him, and therefore was inuaded by Senacherib. After Abaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeare of his raignehee died : but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Inda.

With Ahaz lined Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed fortic yeares, 10 Enfeb. inchion, faith Eufebius : Diodorus and Ctesias finde Anticarmus in flead of this Median, to haue beene So/a mus his Successour, to whom they give fiftie yeares.

Tiglath Phileser held the Kingdome of Asyria, all the raigne of Ahaz : yet so, that Salmanaffar his Sonne may feeme to have raigned with him some part of the time, LKings 28, 16. For we finde that Abaz did fend onto the Kings of A SHVR to helpe him. The Geneua note faies, that thefe Kings of Afour were Teglath Pilefer, and those Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that hee or his Father had hitherto made fuch conquests, as might give him the Lordship over other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historie, nor circumstance that proueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Albur, were Tiglath, and Salmanaffar his Sonne, who raigned with his Father, as 20 hath beene faid before: though how long hee raigned with his Father, it bee hard to define.

At this time beganne the Ephori in Lacedamon, a hundred and thirtie yearesafter Plus in vita Soli. Lyeurgus, according to Plus arch. Eufebius makes their beginning farre later, namely in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first, Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen enery yeare, were controllers, * as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their adulfe and confent. For (faith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consults. In the time of Ahaz died Afchylus, who had ruled in Athenseuer fince the fiftith yeare of Vzzia. Aleamenon the thirteenth of the Medon- 30 tide, or Gouernours of the Athenians (fo called of Medon who followed Codens) faccceded his Father Afchylus, and was the last of these Gouernors: he ruled only two yeares. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Gouernors for life; which ending in this Aleamenon, they erected a Magistrate whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burghomaster or Gouernor of their Citie for ten yeares. This alteration Paufanias in his fourth Booke beginnes in the first yeare of the eight Olympiad. Eusebius and Halicarnasseus in the first of the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeede, Carops the first of these, beganne his ten yeares rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines gouerned about three hundred yeare by the Syluy, of the race of Aneas, tooke end the same Ahaz time: the foundation of Rome 40 being laied by Romulus and Romus in the eight yeare of the same King. Codoman builds it the eleuenth of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I thinke he should, others fomewhat later, and in the raigne of Ezechia. Cicero, Eutropius, Orofius, andothers, square the time of the foundation to the third yeare of the fixth Olympiad. But Halicarnassaus, Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeare of the feuenth: who feeme not only to mee, but to many very learned Chronelogers, to have kept herein the best accompt.

Of the Antiquities of Ftalie , and foundation of Rome in the time of  $\mathbf{A}$  HAs:

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italie.

N D here to speake of the more ancient times of Italie, and what Nations possessit before the arrivall of . Enew, the place may feeme to inuite vs: the rather be- X cause much fabulous matter hath beene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by divers Helicarda names : as first Hefperia, then Aufonia, the one name arising of the Seate, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it : one ancient name of it was alfo Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri : whom Halicarnasseus thinks to have been the first, that brought a Colonie of Areadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italies : concerning which changes of names, Virgil speakes thus.

> Est locus Hesperiam Gray cognomine dicunt : Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque vbere gleba : Oenotrii colucre viri, nanc fama minores . Italiam dixi/le, ducis de nomine, gentem:

There is a Land which Greekes Hefperia name; Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie. Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame, That by late ages of Posteritie, T'is from a Captaines name called Italie.

Who this Captaine or King may have beene, it is very vncertaine. For Firgil 40 speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued to long vpon the whole Countrie, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to finde out the original of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrie, Reineccius hath made a very painfull feafch, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds upon that of Halicaintaffants, Halicaintaffants, who speakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of Italie was given to it: Secondly, vpon that of Instine, who faith, that Brundusium Inf. L. 12. was a Colonie of the Atolians: Thirdly, upon that of Strabe, who affirmes the strabelle. fame of Temefa or Tempfa, a Citic of the Bruty in Italie : Laftly, vpon the au-50 thoritie of Plime, who thewes that the Italians did inhabite only one Region of the plin 13 cot. Land, whence afterward the name was derived overall. Concerning that which is faid of the Eleans and Atolians, who (as he shewes) had one originall; from them hee brings the name of Italie. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, faue that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke 582

words is common, and the letter (a) is changed into (a): which change is found in the name of Athalia, an Illand neere Italie, peopled by the Athalians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Aolic Dialect; of which Dialect (being almost proper to the Atolians) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halternasseus, Quintilian, and Priscian the Grammarian teach. Hercunto appertaines that of Inlian the Apollata, who called the Greekes comins of the Latines. Also the common original of the Greekes and Latines from Liuan; and the Fable of Janus, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italie lay, and was stamped on Coynes, with a Shippe on the other fide; all which is, by interpretation, referred to I.a.a., 10 father of the Greekes and Latines: who fayling ouer the Ionian Sea, that lyes betweene Esolia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Respective thinkes, that the names of Ailes and Italias belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Berofus, who called Cethum, 11:lus; though it may feeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilest he abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, calily disproued. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Stofes: and if Allas were Cethan, or Killin, then was he the sonne of Janan, and nephew of Japheth, the eldest sonne of Wash; which antiquitic farre exceedes the name of Italie, that began after the departure of 20

Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy. Likewise Virgil, who speakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Eleetra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie; but calleth Electra and her fifter Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italias among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not have done, had Ailus and Italis beene one person.

As for the authoritic of Berofus in this case, we neede the leffe to regard it, for that Repreceises himselfe, whose conjectures are more to be valued then the dreames wherewith Annius hath filled Berofus, holdes it but a figment.

That the name of Italie began long after Atlas, it appeares by the Verses of 122-32 gil last rehearfed, wherein hee would not have said, - Nune fama minores Italiam dixisse ducis de nomine gentem, had that name beene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But feeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeares before the Warre of Troj, had left in Italien Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Etolicus, as Strabe, Herodotus, and Paufanias teach) then the name of Italie began: and feeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italia was Commaunder of these Eleans. For though I remember not, that I have read of any fuch Greekeas was named Italus, yet the name of Etolus, written in Greeke Aitolus, was very famous both among the Atolians, and among the E- 40 leans, he being sonne of a King of Elis, and sounder of the Atoian Kingdome. Neither is it more hard to derive the name Italia from Atolia, then Italia from Atolia. So may Virgils authoritie stand well with the collections of Represeits; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

ð. II. 50

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium,

N Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicitie of the Romans, who were a branch of them, fubduing all Italie, and in few ages whatfocuer Nation was knowne in Europe : together with all the Westerne parts of and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Haircarneffaus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) thinke to have beene Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other fignifications that are flrained) imports as much as originall, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Areadians are knowne in vaunting manner to have alwaies vsurped, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; because indeede, neither were the inhabitants of Peleganneliss inforced to forfake their feates fo oft as other Greekes were, who dwelt without that halfe Island, neither had the Arcadians fo vifure a dwelling as 20 the rest of the Pelapannesians, because their Countrie was lesse fruitfull in land; mountainous, and hard of accesse, and they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of thefetherefore having occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, ftile themfelies Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Scate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might bee that the Arcadians who dwelt fomewhat farre from Sea, and are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, thould have beene Authors of new discoueries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulnesse of children, in which those ages abounded, inforceth the superfluous companie to secke another seate, and that some 30 expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Eugander, into the same parts of I. tale, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gaue name to all Greece : but their antiquities are long fince dead, for lack of good records. Neither was their glorie fuch in Italie, as could long fulfaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in thort space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Aufones, Aurunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following diffurbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some civilitie; and he therefore canonized as a God.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Stevenlius, others terme him Stercus-40 tius, and fay, that hee taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did latere, that is lie hidden there, when he fled from Impiter, it is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many Gods of whom one fled from an other; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King raigning in those parts was so mightie, that it should bee hard to finde one Countrie or an other, wherein a man might be fafe from his pursuit. And yet, + as most fables and poeticall fictions, were occasioned by some ancient truth, which See lib. 1. cap. 6 either by ambiguitie of speech or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkely ex- 5.1. 6 sq. preffe (for fothey fained a paffage ouer a River in Hell, because death is a paffage to be , that the original of Saturnes hiding himfelfe was some allusion to that old on nion of the wileit of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Acts; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus abdens te. For it can not be in vaine that the word Saturnus thould also have this very fignification, if it bee deriued (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the original of this word, Latium, ought rather to be fought elsewhere.

Reyneceius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Sonne of Jauan, were the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Celeans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Troians in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Hereupon Reynecoins gathers, 10 that their abode was in Afia: viz. in agro Elaitico; in the Elaitian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a Citie which the Lolians held in Afia, called Elea, or Elaia, Paulanius makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neare sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing only in the firength or weakeneffe of vtterance, which is found betweene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Cereans being descended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Jaum, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elai. 20 tes, it is very likely, confidering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Atolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Lelique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Eleus, the Hauen Eleas, the people Elaite, the Cities Eleus, Elaia, and Elateia, of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cerai and Arcadians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing vnlikely, thatagreeing in language and limilitude of names, they might neuertheleffe differ in found and pronunciation of one and the fameword. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabins in the like manner might be whom the Areadians would call Elatus (of which name 20 they had a Prince that founded the Citic Elateia) bee named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneceus pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Euripylus, Lord of the Ceteurs, being the Sonne of Telephia, whom Herenles begat vpon Auge, the Daughter of Aless King of Arcadia, was flaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans; who (fearing what cuill might befall themselues by the Greekes, if the affaires of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italie, where the Arcadians were planted by Ocnotrus. And Represents farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memorie of his Grand-mother Ange, an Arcadian Ladie, was well contented to take an Arcodian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation 40 either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Letinus: That this name of Elatus may have been taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sonnes of Areas King of Areadia, which gaue name to the Countrie : and betweene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did paffe, almost enterchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Troisn warre it fell into the hand of Hippotheus of the race of Elatus, in whose Posteritie it continued vntill the last. Againe, the name Latinus, having a derivative found, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Regneceins, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the leffe reproofe, 50 confidering that it is not easie to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probabilitic among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the originalls of Latium.

River Liris neare Alinturna. Of the name Lainas, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure; one, the

Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vlyffes by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice only of the second, of whom he faith, that his name was saids in the Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cety, were from his furname called word taken Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reynecems, the difference confilling almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the Sonne of Hercules, whereas Rerneccus makes him his Nephew, by a fonne of the fame name. This Letious haning obtained the fuccession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter 40 and Heire Lauinis, to Turnus the Jonne of Venilia, who was lifter to Amata Latinus

But when Aneu arrived in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might bee imbarked according to the rate which Thurydides allowes to the Veffells then yfed, about one thou fand and two hundred men; then Letinus finding that it would fland best with his affurance, to make alliance with the Trojan, and moved with the great reputation of Anew, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Trey, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incenfed herewith, fought to auenge himfelfe by warre: which was foone ended with his owne death.

50 Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were shee an Italian, shee could not have borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of Aneus; vnleffe we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italie, to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne who ferued in the last yeare of the Troism Warre. But Reyneceius holds her an Asiatique, and thinks withall that Lauinia was of the ancient Kings of the Latines until ENEAS his comming.

He Kings which raigned in Latium before the arrivall of Eneas, were, Saturnus, Pieus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembred, faue what is mentioned alreadie, and many fables of the Greekes, which whether they be appliable to this man, it is for him to iudge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturate to of the Greekes, called by them Keeres, or some other, filled Saturne by the Aborrgines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have beene the fame: *ssakidofien but the names of * Sterces, and Sterculius ( for it may bee this name was not bor- cals the idols rowed from the skill which he taught the people, but rather the foile which they of the headen laied on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him feeme andhence it

Of Pieus it is faid that he was a good Horfe-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pic, may well feeme (as it is interpreted) to have Birkebub, Reizegrowne from the skill which he had in footh-faying, or dinination, by the flight and interpreted chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Pieus, raigned after his Father. Hee Dominus Ster-20 gaue to Evander the Arcadian (who having flaine by milehance his Father Echemus concest and it may be that King of Arcadia, fledinto Italie) the wast grounds on which Rome was afterward after the sa-

Fauna, called Fatua, the lifter of Faunus, was also his Wife, as all Historians at the name of and only topical gree; shee was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastitie; which sed God that praise in her must needes have beene much blemished by her marriage, it selte be-

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his fifter any child, neither doe we reade ficker ato of any other Wife which he had, faue only that Firgii giues vnto him Latinus as his Assid. 7. Sonne, by a Nymph, called Afarica. But who this Marica was it is not found, faue only that her abode was about the · borne before Telephus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Fingland Helicarnasseus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varie who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greeke name Pallas. Amata, which fignificth beloued, or deere, was the name by which the High Priest called enery Virgin, whome hectooke to serve as a Nunne of Vella; wherefore it is the more easily to be thought a surname, how socuer virgil discourse of her and Venilsa her fifter.

Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Aneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrie, was established in that race: wherein it continued untill it was ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Roman.

Q. IIII. Of ÆNEAS, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba.

NEAS himselfe being of the royall bloud of Troy, had the commaund of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his wife Creufa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a fonne called Afcanius; whose furname was Iulus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) 20 beene furnamed Ilus. But when Eners was dead, his wife La-ainia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Afeanius, fledde into the Woods, where she was delicered of a fonne, called thereupon Sylaim, and furnamed Posthumus, becausehe was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauinia was so cuill taken by the people, that Afanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and vfing ber as a Queene, did foster her young sonne, his halfe-brother Sylvins. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the figuration of the place; Afeanius leaving to his mother in law the Citie Lanimum, which Aneas had built, and called after his new wines name, founded the Citie 30 Alba Longa, and therein raigned. The time of his raigne was, according to some, eight and twentie yeares: Virgil gives him thirtie; others five and thirtie, and eight and thirtie. After his decease, there arose contention betweene Sylains, the sonne of Aneas, and Islus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lauinia, Julus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdome to Sylvine Posthumus, whose posteritie were afterward called Sylay.

The raigne of the alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans raigne, I finde thus fet downe

The most of these Kings lined in peace, and did little or nothing worthic of re-Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latinus: who standing much voon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prifet Latini. Of Tie hermus some thinke that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Abula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the comming of Eneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Anentinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwile. Islins, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Eufebius as father of another Intolius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus; who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder fonne of Proc.15, was deprined of the Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whome also his sonne Egesihus was slaine, and sita his daughter made a Nunne of Veffa, that thereby the illue of Numitor might be cut off. But the conceined two fonnes, either by her vncle Anulius, as fome thinke; or by Mars, as the Poets faine; or perhaps by fome man of warre: both the children their vncle commaunded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Laws X which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was fo. that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antho, the daughter of Amsline, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by 20 all, that the two children were preferued, who afterward reuenged the crueitie of their vncle, with the flaughter of him and all his, and reftored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long he raigned I finde not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift encrease of Rome; vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concernes the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male iffue. Roundes chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magistrats; of whom onely two Dictatots are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hoftelius, King of 20 the Romanes, making Warre vpon Rome, died in the Campe; and Metius Suffetius, the fuccessor of Cluitius, who surrendred the Estate of Alba vnto the Romanes, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each fide, who decided the quarrell by Combat : in which, the three brethren Horatif, the Champions of the Romanes, prevailed against the Curiatis, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hoffilius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leave the Romanes to fuch an overthrow, as might make them weake youngh for the Albanes to deale with. Tullus notwithstanding this falsehood obtaining the victorie, rewarded Metius with a cruell death, causing him 40 to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in peeces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Iulij: of whome C. Iulius Cefar being descended, not onely gloried in his auncient, royall, and forgotten pedegree, in full affemblie of the Romanes, then gouerned by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and judgement obtained the Soueraignetic of the Romane Empire, much by him enlarged, to himselfe and his posteritie; whereby the name of Enew, and honor of the Troian and Alban Race, was for eniued, that fel-

Of the beginning of Rome, and of ROMVLVS birth and death.

F Rome, which denoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best show the beginnings, which (though somewhat vncertaine) depend much vpon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that raigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations betweene Euphrates and the Óccan were broken in pecces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beaft, it is not to be described in one to place, having beene the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident vnto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius, Pictor, Portius, Cato, Calphur. new Pilo, Sempronius, and others, fecke to derive the Romans from Ianus : but Herodo. tus, Marfylus, and many others of equal credit, give the Grecians for their auncestors: and as Strabo reporteth in his fifth booke; CAECILIVS rerum Romanorum (criptor eo argumento colligit, Romam à Gracis effe conditam quod Romani Graco ritu, antiquo instituto HERCVLI rem facram faciunt, matrem quoque EVANDRI venerantur Romani; CAECILIVS (faith he) a Romane Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greekes, because the Romanes, after Greekish fashion, by auncient Ordinance doe facrifice to HERCVLES: the Romanes also worship the mother of 20

Plutarch in the life of Romalus remembers many founders of that Citie; as Romanus the fonne of Viyffes and Circe; Romus the fonne of Emathion, whome Diomedes fent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who draue the Tuscans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome vpon Euander, faying, That it was before times called Valentia. Heraelides giues the denomination to a captine Ladie, brought thither by the Greeians: others fay, That it was aunciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse Saint Augustine in his third Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But Liuie will haue it to be the worke of Romulus, euen from the foundation : of whome and his 30 conforts Iuuenal to a Roman Citizen vaunting of their originall, answered in these

> Attamen vt longe repetas, longeá, reuoluas Maiorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum, Aut paftor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree fo farre: Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were, Some Shepheard was, or elfe, that Ile forbeare. meaning either a Shepheard, or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That heehad Rhea for his mother, and Mars was supposed to be his father; that he was nurst by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Fauffula, a Shepheards wife. The fame vnnaturall nurling had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch faith, it is like youngh that Amulius came concred with armor to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to me that he might have two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other to fatisfie his appetite, because slice 50 was faire and goodly. For thee being made a Nunne of the Goddeffe Festa, it Fanchet, fil, 114 was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also finde in Fanchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Merouee, King of the Francs, was begotten by a monfler of the Sea: but Fauchet fayes, Let them beleene it that lift; Il le croira qui voudra:

allo of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poeticall inuentions: but to answere these imaginations in generall, it is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatrie, and when there were as many Gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; thendid many women greatly borne, couer fuch flips as they made byproteiting to beforced by more then humane power,: to did Oenone confesse to Paris, that thee had beene ranished by Apollo. And Anohijes boasted that hee had knowne Fenue. Ent Rhea was made with child by fome man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the God of battell, according to the fense of the time. Oerene was over-to come by a firong wit, and by fuch a one as had those properties after bed to Apollo. The Mother of Merones might fancie a Sea Captaine to bee gotten with youg by fuch a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Hero Joins. Aness was a battard and begotten upon forme faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the child of fuft, which is Venus. Romalus was norn by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtefans in those daies were called Wolfes, que nune (faith HALICAR NASSAEVS) honeitiori vocabulo amice appellantur; Which are now by as honester numeeriled friends. It is also written, that Ronnelus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather our of the world by his Father Mag, in a great florme of thunder, and lightning: fo was it faid that Aneas vanished away by the 20 River Numicus : but thereof Laureailo for aketh modertly; for hee rehearfeth the other opinion, that the florme was the furie of the Senators, but feemeth to achere partially to this taking vp; and many Authors agree that there was an vinaturall darkenesse, both at his birth and at his death, and that he might bee slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not valikely. For the Emperour Anaflafus was flaine with habtning, fo was Strabo the Father of Pompey flaine with a thunder-boit : fo Carns the Emperour (who fucceeded Probus) whilefthe lodged with his Armie vpon the River Tigris, was there flaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that beganne him; for he was begotten by a man of Warre, and by violence destroied. And that he died by violence (which destinie followed most of the 30 Koman Emperours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus; who was but the feworth

King after him: who when he had murthered his father in law, commanded that helhould not be buried, for (faid he) Romulus himselfe dyed and was not buried. But let Halica raffiens end this dispute : whose words are these. They (faith he) who crownecrest to the truth, say that he was slaine by his owne Citizens; and that his crueltie in puniforments of offendors, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his flaughter. For it is reported that both when his mother was ranified, whether by fome man, or by a God, the whole body of the funne was celipfed, and all the earth concred with darkeneffe like vnto night, and that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, 40 doth containe (befides what is here already spoken of him) the conqueit of a few miles which had foone beene forgotten, if the Roman greatn-fie built upon that foundation, had not given it memoric in all ages following, even vnto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of body, patient of travell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the vie of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition hee knew not how to temper, which caused him to flay his brother, and neglect renenge of the death of Tatius his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord' alone in those narrow Territories. He raigned seuen and thirtie yeares: first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death fingle, till he was flaine, as is alreadie shewed: after which time the Soueraignetie fell into the hands of Nama, a man to him vn-

30 knowne, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Eome it selfe in her later times hath somewhat resembled this King. For having long beene sole Governesse till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greeke Emperour was crushed by forraine enemies, and the Latines dispoiled of Imperiall power, shee fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe-hooke to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excelline magnificence, from whence by the fame degrees it fell, being driven from luxurie to defensive armes, and therein has uing beene vnfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Crossers staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the storic of the times of King Ahaz, during whose raigne in Jurie, the foundations of this famous Citie

the first yeare of Ahaz his raigne was confounded with the last of his Father totham, so was the later end of his fixteene yeares taken up in the three first of Ezekias his Sonne. This appeares by the raigne of Ho-(ea, ouer Ifrael, which beganne in the twelfth of abes, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Abaz his fourteenth. But the third of Holes was the first of Ezekin; so it followes, that Ezekin beganne to raigne in his Fathers fourteenth yeare. Like e- 30 nough it is, that the third yeare of Hofea, the same being the fourteenth of Abaz, was almost spent when Ezekia beganne, and so the fifteenth yeare of Ahaz may have been concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hosen beganne his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeare of Abaz was almost compleat, some would finde the meanes how to disloyne the first of thezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one yeare later, of which years, Abaz may perhaps have lived not many daies. labu, and fuccession of lehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to raigne whileft his Father lived, we have alreadic faid enough.

Ofthis godly King Ezekius, we finde, that his very beginning tettified his deuo. rion and zeale. For whether it were fo that his vnfortunate and vngratious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sonnes proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeare and first moneth of his raigne, wherein Ezekins opened the dores of the Temple, 2 chien. 29. 133 were to be understood as the beginning of his fole gouernement; we plainely finde it to have beene his first worke, that he opened the dores of the house of the Lord, which Achaz had thut vp, cleanfed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idolls, restored the Pricits to their offices, and effates, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered 2.6/1000.20. which had beene for many yeares neglected, and brake downe the brafen Serpent of Moles, because the people burnt incense before it, and bee called it Nebulhtan, 2. Kings 18. which tignifieth a lumpe of braffe. He did also celebrate the Passe-ouer with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the ifraelites of the ten Tribes : many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came up to Ierufalem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of ifrael did laugh the Meffengers of Ezekia to scorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliuerance out of the Egyptian feruitude, fell into a new feruitude, out of which they neo yer were deliucred. For in the fourth of Ezekia his raigne, Salmanaffar the Sonne of Tiglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that Holea King of Ifrael had practifed with See King of Egypt, against him: inuaded Ifrael, befreged Samaria, and in the third yeare (after the Inhabitants had endured all forts of miferies) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Afgria and Media : among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Ninine, in whose Seats and Places the Afgrians feut strangers of other Nations, and among them manv of the ancient Enemies of the Ifraelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernam, befides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatife of the holy Land.

These later Asprian Kings, and the Persians, which sollowed them, are the first, of whom wee finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore ferue most aptly to joyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than sabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of Historie. True it is, that of Cyrus and fome other Perisans, we finde in the Bible the fame names by which other Authors have recorded them : but of Phal and Salmanaffar, with other Afgrian, Children Kings, diverlitic of name hath bred queltion of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanaslar, King of Allur, who raigned in the time of Jhaz, and Ezekia, Kings of Iuda, and of Fielen King of Ifrael, whom he 40 carried into captinitie; and whereas Ptolomie makes mention of Nabonaslar, speaking precifely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmonassar and Nabonaffar were one and the fame man. The like reason also requireth, that it bee shewed of Nebushadnezzar, that hee was the same, whom Ptolomic calleth

Of both these points Bucholerus hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact calculations of fundric good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares that betweene Nabonaffar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred fortic and fixe yeares : at which distance of time the raigne of Salmanassar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the same Bucholerus alleageth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, 30 in the Prutenick Tables. Wardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Piolomie, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who fent Embaffadors to Hezekia, King of Iuda: So that if wee reckon backwards to the difference of time, betweene Merodach and Salmanasfar, we shall finde it the same which is betweene Mardocempadus and Nabo-nailar. Likewise Function doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samares. to the denastation of Ierufalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnessar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirtie and three yeares : the selfe same diffance of time is found in Ptolomic, betweene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For. whereas Ptolomie seemesto differ from this accompt, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and fortic yeares, than the destruction of Ierufalem, we care to understand that he tooke Samaria in the eighth yeare of his raigne; so that the seuen foregoing yeares added to these one hundred thirtie and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Prolomie. Prolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twentie and seuen yeares. Now it wee adde to these one hundred twentie seuen, the thirteene enfuing of Nabuchadnessars yeares, before the Citie and Temple were destroied, we have the summe of one hundred and fortie yeares. In so plaine a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all, that Piolomie placeth the first of Nahopolassar one hundred twentie and two yeares, after the first of Nibonas ar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the confent of all Mathematicians; which in accompt of times I hold more fure than the authoritie of any Historie; and therefore I thinke it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe so throughly concurre. Yet foralmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered, whereby he proued Baladan the Father of Merodach, to have beene this Nabonafiar, I will not spare to loose a word or two in gining the Reader satisfaction herein, It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomie recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the raigne of Mardocempadus; the second yeare of whose raigne, is, according to Ptolomie concurrent in part with the twentie feuen of Nabonassar. For the second of three ancient Eclipses which he calculates, being in the second yeare of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabeniflar twentie feuen yeares, seuenteene daies, and eleuen houres : the accompt from Natonifar, beginning at high noone the first day of the Egyptian moneth Thot, than 32 answering to the twentie fixt of Februarie; and this Eclipse being fittle minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of Februarie; fo that the difference of time between thetwo Kings Aabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomie, according to the Agyptian yeares. But how does this proue, that Mardocempacus or Merodale, was the Sonne of Nabonaffar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Succesfor, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to fatisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards beleeve Mardocempadus to have beene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabanassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; he might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But 40 because our Countrie-man Lidy ste hath reprehended Sealiger for changing his opinion; and that both Torniellus, who followes Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calminus, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold up the same affertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar: I have taken the paines to fearch, as farre as my leifure and diligence could reach, after any fentence that might proue the Kindred or succession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Aimagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduerse to Sealiger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this businesse) any fentence more nearely prouing the fuccession of Merodach to Nabonassar, than the place now last rehearfed : which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was 50 Father to the other, than (that I may vse a like example) the as neare succession of William the Conquerer, declares him, to have beene Sonne, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, wee may fafely goe on with our accompt from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar; and not fearing that the Readers will be driven from our booke, when they finde fomething in it, agreeing with annius. for a fmuch as the fe Kings mentioned in Scriptures, raigned in Babylon, and A Bris. in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are assigned to Belofus, Nabonaffir, and Mardacempadus, and the rest: no good Historie naming any others, that raigned there in those ages, and all Astronomicall observations, fitly concurring, with the yeares that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

ð. I I.

Of the danger and delinerance of Indea from SENNACHERIB.

Hen Salmanaffar was dead, and his sonne Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeare of Ezechius, he demanded of him fuch Tribute as was agreed on at fuch time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmana //ar, inuited by Ahaz, innaded Rezen King of Damafeus, and delivered him from the dangerous Warre which Ifrael had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Exechias denied, Sennacherib, having (as it feemes) a purpose to in-20 uade Agypt, fent one part of his Armie to lie before Ierufalem. Now though Ezen chias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirtie hundred talents of filter, and thirtie talents of gold: wherewith he prefented Sennacherib, now fet downe before Lachis in India, yet vnder the colour of better affurance, and to force the King of Indiato deliner hostages, 2, King 18, 21the African environed Ierusalem with a groffe Armie, and having his Sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Exechias directed his three greatest Counsellers, to parlie with Rabfaces, over the Wall; and to receive his demands; who yied three principall arguments to perfwade the people to yeeld themselues to his Master Sennacherib. For though the 30 Chancellar, Steward, and Secretarie, sent by Ezechias, defired Rabfaces to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Ierrifb, yet hee with a more loud voice directed his speech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the first, hee made them know, That if they continued oblinate, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, bee inforced to cate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, he altogether disabled the King of Agypt, from whom the In least hoped for fuccour; and compared him to a broken staffe, on which whoseeuer leaneth pierceth his owne hand: Thirdly, that the Gods who should helpe them, Exechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by fome) the bralen Serpent, which had beene preferued euer fince Offofestime: 40 and withall he bad them remember the Gods of other Nations: whom, not withstanding any power of theirs, his Master had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himselfe, in whom shey trusted, he perswaded them by no meanes to relie on him; for he would deceive them. But finding the people filent (for fo the King had commanded them) after a while when he had understood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, he himselfe left the Asprian forces in charge to others, and fought Sennacherib at Lebna in Indea, either to informe him

Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly aduifed, and partly threatned to fubmit himfelfe : vling the 50 fame blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias fending those Counsellers to the Prophet Efar, which had lately beene fent to Rabfaces, received from him comfort, and affurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not prevaile; against whom the King also befought aide from almightie God, re-

The reason that moved Sennacherib to desire to possesse himselfe in hast of Jerusalem, was that he might thereinto have retraited his Armie, which was departed, as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Egypt, for feare of Terhaea : and though the Scriptures are filent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the lewes in effect) ver the ancient Berofus, and out of him Iofephus, and S. Hierome, together with Herodo-

Herails 12.69 tus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Af- 10 fyria: which he might justly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekal King of Israel : as Gilead ouer tordan, and the rest of Arabia Petrea adjoyning : the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Legypt, to be Vulcans Pricit, and reporteth that the reason of Sennacheribs returne from Pelusium in Egypt, which healfo besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in funder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their weapons of that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: Tofand literate but the approach of Terhaes, remembred by Iofephus and Berofus, was the more vrgent. S. Hierome vpon the feuen and thirtie of Efay, out of the fame Berolin, as also Hey. Emery, L.z. in part out of Herodotus, whom to fephas citeth fomewhat otherwise than his wordes 20 lie, reports Senacheribs retrait in these words. It is certaine, that Venus Frania was worthipped by the Affyrians; and fo was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Eufebius, and Cyrillus witnesse. Many fancies there are, what cause his some had to murther him but the in most likely is, that he had formerly disinherited those two, and conferred the Empirc on Allarhaddon. Tobit tells vs, That it was fiftie fine dayes after Senacheribs returne, ere he was murthered by his fonnes; during which time he flew great numto bers of the Ifraelites in Niniue, till the most just God turned the Sword against his Fter this maruellous deliuerie, Ezekias sickened, and was told by Isaiah, that he must die: but after he had besought God with teares for his deliuerie, Isaiah as he was going from him returned againe, and had deliuerie, If siah as he was going trou and reconcile after three warrant from the Spirit of God to promife him recouerie after three warrant from the Spirit of God to promife him recouerie after three warrants. But Ezekin somewhat dayes, and a prolongation of his life for fifteene yeares. But Ezekius fomewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a figne to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrarie way, and 2. Kings 20. went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekiss to lament (faith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despaire that the Messas should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seede. His difease seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine ginen him by the Prophet, to wit, a maffe of Figges, layed to the Botch or Soare.

This wonder when the Wife men of Chaldes had told to Merodach, King of Balylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure hee had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who tolde him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and what soener thy fathers have layed E/ay 394 op in flore to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, sayth the Lord. It may freme firange, how Ezekia should have got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeare before. But the spoyle of the same Senseherib his Campe repayed all with advantage, and made Ezekia richer vpon the fuddaine then euer he had beene: which vnexpected wealth was a strong temptati-40 on to boasting. After this time Ezekia had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made vnto his life, he died, having raigned nine and twentic yeares. One onely offenfine Warre he made, which was against the Philistims with good successe. Among his other acts (thortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) hee Eccl. 43. denifed to bring water to Ierufalem.

In two respects they say that hee offended God: the one, that hee rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemie; the other, that hee so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbeare to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moued Ezekhus (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit 50 him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recourse of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearefull enemie. For Alredach, who was Commaunder and Lieutenant under Senacherib in Balylon, vfurped that State himselfe, in the last yeare of that King, and held it by strong hand against his sonne Asserbaddon; who was not onely simple, but impaired in strength, by the molectation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembring, that their ancestor Phul Belochus had fet his owne master Sardanapalus besides the cultion, thought it as lawfull for himfelfe to take the opportunitie which this Kings weakenesse did offer, as it had beene for Belechus to make vie of the others wickedneile: and fo, finding himfelfe beloued of the Babylonians, and fufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and preuailed. The affertion of this historie is made by the same arguments that were yield in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phal Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearfe. So of this new Race, which cut afunder the Line of Ainus, there were onely fine Kings

But for a fmuch as the last yeare of Salmanaffar was also the first of Senacherib his fonne, we reckon the time wherein the house of Phul held the Affyrian Kingdome, to have beene an hundred and one yeares; of which, the last fine and twentie were Spent with Ezekia, under Salmanaffar, Senacherib, and Affarhaddon.

Forto reconcile fo great a difference, as is found in those Writers that varie from Eusebius, is more than I 40 dare undertake. I will onely here fet downe the roll of Kings that raigned in Media, accordingly as fundrie Authors have delivered it.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and tomake them also agree with Eusebius. But for asmuch as it seemes to me an impollible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Ctesias and Metasihenes, I will lay the burthen upon Eusebius, who liucdin an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore suffice, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not flay to fearch. The twentie nine yeares of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the foure first that were chosen Gouernours of Athens for ten yeares; that is, of Charops, Alimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, sauc that Rome was built in his first yeare; of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second and third I finde only the names. The fourth made himselfe knowne by a strange example of justice, or rather of crueltie, that hee shewed vpon his owne Daughter. For he finding that shee had offended in vnchastitie, caused her to bee locktyp with an Horse, giving to neither of them any foode: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, deuoured the vnhappie Woman.

HI e mulation and quartells arising in these times, between the mightic Kingdomes of **gypt and Affyria*, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in **gypt*, and setting downe briefly the flate of that Countrie, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with **Affyria* for the Maltire. Of Cham, the sonne of Nach, who fird planted that Countrie, and of Ofris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that raigned there, vinill the **Ifactive were thence delivered, more hat beene faid alreadie than 39 I can fland to; though I hold it no flame to faile in fuch conjectures. That which I haue deliuered, in speaking mine opinion of the **Egyptian Dynassies, must here againe helpe me. For it may truely bee affirmed, T hat the great number of Kings, which are said to haue raigned in **Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as to sep was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore, I will not only forbeare to seeke after those, whom **Berodotn** and **Diodorns* haue reckond vp, from the mouthes of **Egyptian** Priects, deliuering them by number, without rehearling their names; but will saue the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names only are found; the yeares of their raignes, and other circum-later.

flances, prouing them to haue beene Kings in deede, being not recorded.

But that I may not feeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I lift; it were not amille, to give vnto the Reader fuch fatisfiation in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth as doord. First therefore, were ought not to beleeue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priefs haue reckoned by, to magnific their Antiquities. For week how, that from Abraham, our Sanion Christ was removed only fortic two descents, which makes it evident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persun Empire, there could not have passed any twice as many successions in **Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, have raigned longer than fortie yeares. It followes that we should square the number of the **Egyptint** Skings, in some even proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries.

50 Kings, in fome euen proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countrier.

Assortherest, whose names wee finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the painest to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy Warre, written by tilliam Archbisshop of Type, may easily per swade b himselfe, that it is not hard to find names enough, of such as might be thought to haue raigned in Ægypt, being none other them.

than Regents or Viceroies. Yet will I here infert, as briefly as I can, fomethings making to that purpole; for the pleafure and information of fuch, as will not trouble themselues with turning ouer many Authors.

When Elbadech the Caliph ruled in £gypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a fubtile man, made himfeile Saldan, by force and curning, chaling away Sanar an Araban, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quartell to Amalricke King of Iemfalow, and fustained, with little losse, an inuation, which Amalricke made vpon Ægypt. Hereupon hee grow so infolent and proud, that Sanar the Inner Saldan hoped to make his partie good against him, it hee could get any forces wherewith to enter Ægypt. Briefly, Sanar Beeth to Norelline, King to of Damasleo, for aide, who sends an Armie of his Turkes, wheether Command of Syraon, against the Saldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and sought: The Victorie was Dargans, but be enjoyed it not: for in sew dayes after, he was faine by treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignitie; which to establish he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citic of Caine.

To all these doings, the Caiph Elibidea's gaue little regard; for he though it little concerned him, which of them liued, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilest hee might have the profit of it; and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) doe nearely touch the Caiph himselfe. System with his Tankes, whom Sama hath gotten to come into Acgypt, will not 20 now be intreated there to leave him, and quetly goe their way home. They size vpon the Towne of Belbeis, which they fortifice, and there attend the arruall of more Companie from Damssee, for the conquest of all Acgypt. The Solimper-cities their intent, and finds himselfe not strong enough to expell them, much lest to repell the Tanksh Armic, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Messer to King Almarieke of Israslaten, whom with large promises, hee gets to bring him aide, and so drives out the Tankes. Of all this trouble, the great Calip be haverened thing, or not for much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owner game.

A greater mischiefe ariseth, concerning the Califb Elbadech particularly, in his owne Title. Stracon, Captaine of the Turkes, that had beene in Aegypt, goes to the 20 Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Aegypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet, that falle Prophet, the Soueraignetic over all that were of the Stracen Law) and tells him the weakeneffe of the Aegiptian, with his owne abilitie of doing feruice in those parts, offering his best meanes for the extirpation of the Schilmaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Aegypt, with the Westerne parts, under the Subjection of the Babylenian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Easterne Prouinces are vpin Armes; and Syracon, with a mightic power, defcendeth into Aegypt. The noise of this great expedition to affrighteth King Amaricke, that with all his forces hee hafteth into Aegypt: well knowing how nearely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Isrufalem, to keep the Sarracens from joyning 40 all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, wellcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giving them all manner of content, as it behooved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drave the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victorie was not fo foone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concernes our prefers purpole) that of fode sperate a danger, the Coliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to have beene Kingia title only, who medled so little in the Gouernement? The Soldan, sinding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well say, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King dimensite, you condition, that he should abide by it. He promise ha great Tribute (William of Tyre calls 13 it a Tribute; the Sanaeaus, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of tenglem should receive out of Ægypt, for this behoovefull affistance. But the Christians with soldam (how much soever he tooke vpon him) was subject to an higher Lord, would make no bargaine of such importance, with any other than the Caliph himfelie. Hereupon Hugh Earle of Cofarca, and a Knight of the Templars, are fent vnto Elhadech, to ramie the couenants. Now shall wee see the great-ness of the Caliph and his citate.

Thele Embaffadors were conneighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Athiopians, which, with all diligence, did renerence vnto the Soldan, as he pasted along Through these fireights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the grauntie of Embassadors, but were enforced to admire the things which detained their eies. For there they faw goodly marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with emboffed works, curious pauements, filipponds of marble with cleare waters, and many forts of itrange Birds, vnknowne in these parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then were vnd feouered. The further they went the greater was the magnificence; for the Calipb his Eunsches conneighed them into other Courts within thefe; as turre excelling the former, as the former did furpaffe ordinarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearfe, how, the further they entred, the more high flace they found, and cause of meruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally, they were brought into the Caliphs owne 20 lodeinas, which were yet more flately, and better guarded, where entring the Prefence, the Soldan, having twice proftrated himfelfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he ware about his neck, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curraine, behind which the Caliph fate. Prefently the trauerfe, wrought with gold and pearles, was opened, and the Caliph himfelfe discouered, fitting with great Majelue on a throne of gold, having very few of his most inward servants and Eunaches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kiffed his Mafters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almaricke, deliring the Caliph himselfe to ratisfie them, in presence of the Embaffadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly performe all 30 which was promifed. But this contented not the Embaffadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargaine; which the Agyptians, that stood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cafarea faw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect. Sta, Truth feekes no holes to hide it felfe; Princes, that will hold couenant, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely; Give vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for wee will make no bargaines with your Gloue. Much adoe there was about this: for it feemed against the Majestie of such a Prince to yeeld so farre. But, when it would none o-40 therwife be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Seruants) hee vouchfafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and so rehearling the couenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embailadors, with fuch rewards as tellified his Greatneffe.

in this Caliph and his Sultan, were may different the Image of the ancient Pharach, and his Fiterop: we fee a Prince of great clates, litting in his Palace, and not vexing himfolic with the great preparations made againft him, which terrife his neighbour Countries: we fee his Viceroy, in the meane feafon, ving all R oiall power; making warre and peace, entertaining, and expelling Armies of thrangers; yea, making the Land of Egppt tributarie to a forraine Prince. What greater authoritie was given 50 to 16/ph, when Pharach faid unto him, Thou shall be over mine boute, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings Throw will I be about thee, Behold, I have fother content all the Land of Egypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Gouernement; neither can I approoue the conjecture of mine Author, where he ethinks, that the Leyptians; euer lines

In/ephs time, haue felt the burthen of that feruitude, which he brought vponthem. when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his judgement good; that he affirmes this manner of the Agyptian Kings, in taking their case, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practifed by the Pharaolic For we finde, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomicus Lagi, and his sonne Plice ladelphus, founder and eltablisher of that race) were given, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Ennuches, and other ministers of their delires. The pleasures which that Countries affoorded, were indeede sufficient, to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Ægyptians held their Princes, gaue them 10 fecuritie, whereby they might the better trult their Officers, with so ample Com. mission. But of this matter I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroies gouerning A. gypt, is fet downe by Mofes, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who lived in the same age; was, in few yeares after, Chancellor of the Kingdome of Ierusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of C.esarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remaines, that wee bee not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleeue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Agyptians, have honored with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of fuch, as wee finde by circumstance, likely to have raigned in that Countrie; after 20 whom it followes that we should make enquirie.

of Acherres; whether he were Vchorevs that was the eighth from Osymandy as. Of Osymandy as and his Tombe.

N this businesse I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope 30 to attain to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorius varies from Herodotius, Englebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue sought to gather the truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree. In this case Annius would do good feruice, if a man could truth time. But it is enough to bee beholding to him, when others doe either fay nothing, or that which may juftly bee fulfpected. I will therefore hold my felfe contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Ofria, 161, Orm, and those antiquities removed to fare cut of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Expr., it shall suffice, that Herodorm, Diedown, and Enfehiss, have not beene silent, and that Reines 40 eight hath taken paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or found scattering in others.

From the departure of Ifraelout of Egypt, vnto the raigne of Thueris (who is generally taken to be the fame that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no difa, greement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of raigne.

Atheres was the first of these, who succeeded vince Cheschers, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reinectus to bee the same whom Diedorus calls Vehorcus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diedorus of a great King, named Ofmandyus, from whom I there wis said to be the eighth; it will so either hardly follow, that Timans (as Reineccius conjectures) was the great Ofmandyus; or essential that this Achieres was I chorus; for the distance between them was more than eight generations. Mercater judgeth Ofmandyus to have beene the husband of Acentheres, Orus the second his Daughter; thinking that Membhan

(cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wives, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wines right. As for Vehoreus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man : for he takes Ogdons, not to fignifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word elfe doth) the eighth, but to be an Agyptian name, belonging also to Vehoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vexe my braines in the unprositable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Ofymandyas, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Eexplians did fabuloufly expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Armie, to with the fiege of a Towne, the captivitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians faid to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King : which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to have been erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Agpt, and to their Viceroies; whileft yet they were not fo ambitious, as every one to have his owne particular monument, ftriuing therein to exceede all others. This appeares by the many statuacs, therein placed, by the Warres, the judgement Seate, the receiving of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the accompt of Reuennucs, and plentie of all Cattaile and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the 20 feuerall Offices of a Gouernour. On the Tombe of Ofmanayas was this inferiorion. I am O SYMANDY AS King of Kings; If any defire to know what I am, or where I lie, let him exceede some of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceede his workes, labour to know what he was. But fince by those wordes, or where I lie, it should feeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully suspect that it was to seph, whose bodie was preserved among the Hebrewes, to bee buried in the Land of Canam, and this emptie Monument might King Orus, who out-lived him, creet in honor of his high deferts, among the royall Sepulchers. To which purpose, the plentie of Cattaile, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name ofymandy as doth not hinder this conjecture; feeing lofeph had one new name given to 30 him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dreame, and might, vpon further occasions, haue another, to his encrease of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkifb Baffaes are called, that is, Great aboue

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls out right, between ethetimes of 10/eph and Acherres, (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that raigned after the great Orus, whose Viceva piecph was yet will I hereby seek, entither to fortilie mine owneconjecture, as touching 10/eph, norto inferre any likelihood of Acherres his being Yehoreus. For it might well bee, that Achemphu was built by some such that the like to the Caliph Elean, who having to his Masters and to the Caliph Elean, who having to his Masters and to the Caliph Elean, who having to his Masters.

of CHERRES, ARMEVS, RAMESSES, and AMENOPHIS. Of MYRIS. and the Lake that beares his name.

Hen Acherres had raigned eight yeares, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fifteene yeares : then raigned Armeus fine yeares, and after him Rame/fes, threefcore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameffes is that Historie vnderstood by Eusebius, which is common among the 10 Greekes, under the names of Danaus and Egyptus. For it is faid that

Danaus, being expelled out of Agypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom you feeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his Brothers fittle Sonnes, but commanded euery one of them to killher husband the first night; that only Hypermnestra, one of his Daughters, did faue her hufband Lynceus, and fuffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudie fifters, when they died, were enjoyined this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessell with water.

The raigne of Danaus in Argas was indeede in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus; and Ramesses, A gyptus; is more then Remeecius beleeues: hee rather takes 20 Armeus to have beene Myris, or Meris, who caused the great Lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can eafily believue, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of fuch qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom wee spake before; so doe I not finde how in so short a raigne, as fine yeares, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required vnto the Lake of waris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulchre and his Wines being fome part, it is manifest that he was not buried in argos. Wherefore of Atyris, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose raignes we have no assurance, I may truly fay, that their great workes are not enough to proue them of the house of Pharach, feeing that greater deedes, or more absolute, then were those of Joseph, 30 who bought all the people of Agypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Geboar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrie Tributaric; were performed by none of them,

It shall therefore be enough to set downe the length of their raignes, whom we finde to have followed one another in order of fuccession: but in rehearing the great acts which were performed, I will not fland to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand fixe hundred furlongs in compasse, and fiftic fadomes deepe. It served to receive the waters of Nilus, when the ouer-flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Coun-40 trie, and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not rife high enough. In opening the fluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the Lake it selfe defraied that cost; feeing the tribute imposed vpon Fish taken therein, was every day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy sweet ointments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the middest of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchers of Miris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; having on the rops their statues, fitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet is it very great. The yeares of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inferting one 50 Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should have raigned one yeare and odde moneths of the time; but I hold not this difference worthie of examination.

After Ramefes, his fonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie yeares. Some giue him only nineteene yeares; and Mercator thinkes him to have beene the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have alreadic spoken in the first Booke.

ð. I I I I.

Of the Kings that raigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

FIHOSIS, Or Zethus, raigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftie fiue yeares. To him are ascribed the famous acts of that ancient sefosiris. But the state of the World was not such in these times, that so great an expedition, as the old Sejostris made, could have beene either cailly performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paffed, had it now beene performed, as any man will perceive if hee looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and consider who lived with this Zethus. With this King beganne the Dinastie of the Larthes; which Reineccius conjectures to have had the fame fignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria, were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iffued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Agypt) and to have fignified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which these Kings were Generalls, 20 I take to have been against the Athiopians: for fure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Palastina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they transiled ouer the defert fands, on the other hand; to feeke matter of conquest, in the poore Countries of Africa. But these Generalls (if the Larthes were fuch) were not many. Fine only had that title; and the last of these tooke it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the first; in such fort as the Roman Emperors were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most vusuteable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his Succeffors forbeare the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appeares by this particular) tooks name from the Kings, that the Kings also did administer the gouernement them-30 selues; and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much vnto the Viceroics. But it is to be considered, that what is said of these Larthes, depends only vpon conjesture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Viceroies, might bee great enough, though some few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For fowe finde in lohn Leo, that the Soldan of Agypt (after fuch time as the 16th Leo, 18. Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soueraignetic to himselfe) had vnder him a Viceroy, stiled Eddaguadare, who had authoritie to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good spend of 40 the Soldans Treasure. So might the Office of the Viceroies continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countrie, as those of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time, as many thinke, that the feuenteenth Dynastie was called of the Sheep-heards, because to seph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themselves that raigned; as this was faid to be of the Larthes or Generalls. The next, as Mianetho (but Annius his Manetho ) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, for a funch as Vapines, and Se/ae, raigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs 50 now returne to the businesse which we left.

Ramfes was King after Zethus, or Setholis, threefcore and fixe yeares. He is mistaken for that fecond Sefostris, of whom I have spoken in the first Bookes. I finde nothing worth rehearfall of this Ramfes, or of Amenophis, and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which raigned fortie, the later fixe and twentie veares. Wherefore it may well bee, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by these as hereditarie.

Thuoris, the last of the Larthes, raigned only seuen yeares; yet is heethought to haue beene that Process, of whom Herodotus hath mention, faying, That he tooke Helena from Paris, and after the fack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. I neede say no more in refutation of this, then that the time of Thuoris his raigne, lasted not so long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by fome) together with Thon, and others. tnentioned by Greeke Writers in this bulinesse, or in other such matters, may seeme to be vnder-Officers: for fuch only are like to have had their relidencie about Pha- 10 res, and the Sea coast, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Protein, who detained Helen, it is faid, That he could foretell things to come, and that hee could change himfelfe into all shapes: whereby is signified his craftie head, for which he is growne into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sea God. and keeper of Neptunes Scale-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admirall, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remples, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herocotus, who calls him Ramfinitus, and tells a long tale, fit to pleafe children, of his couetousnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning Theese, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may beleeue what he list. How 20 long this King raigned I know not, nor thinke that either hee, or his Father, did

Of Egyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors. their times being not recorded. The Kings of Agypt, according to CEDRENVS. Of VAPHRES and SESAC.

Any other names of Agyptian Kings, are found scattered here and 30 there; as Tonepherfolis, of whom Suidas delivers only the bare name and titles Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macoabim, who perhaps was the fame that by Suidan is called Senves, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Philition that lined under him, Benehyin, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Deuil, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, defiring to know, who before him had beene, or after him should be so mightic as himselfe. The answere or confession of the De- 40 uill was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Pless his worke, Of the truenesse of Christian Religion. The Greeke Verses are somewhat otherwise, and more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the fense is all one; which is this:

> First God, and next THE WORD, and then THE SPRITE, Which three be ONE, and joyne in ONE all three: Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence fraile wight, The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suides had borrowed all this of Cedrenes, had I not found fomewhat more in Suidau, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vied, and that claufe, of his giving name to the Hand: though in this last point I hold Suides to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seemes to me, in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of raigne. Indeede the very name of that Booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genelis, is alone enough to breede suspition of some imposture : but the Frierly stuffe that hee alledgeth out of it, is fuch as would ferue to diferedit himfelfe, were it not otherwife apparant, that he was a man both deuout, and of good judgement, in matters that fell within his compaffe. I will here fet downe the Lift of olde Egyptian Kings deliuered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets downe is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham. After him hee findes many of a new race, deriving their pedegree thus: Wimrod, the to fonne of Chiss, was also called orion; and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three fonnes: Picus, furnamed Inpiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chafing his father out of Allyria into Italia, raigned in his flead thirtie yeares, and then gaue vp that Kingdome to Iuno, his fifter and wife, and to Belus his fonne: after which Belus, who raigned onely two yeares, 2(inus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visite his olde father Saturne: Saturne forthwith religned the Kingdome to him . Picus Jupiter raigned in Italie threefcore and two yeares, had threefcore and tenne Wines or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete. The principall of Inpi-20 ters fonnes were Faunus, Perfeus, and Apollo, Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: hee raigned in Italie, after his father, five and thirtie yeares: and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into £grpt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Mizraim, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeares. After Mercurie, Vulcan raigned in Act ypt foure yeares and a halfe. Then Sol, the fonne of Fulcan, raigned twentie yeares and a halfe. There followed in order Sofis, Ofiris, Orus, and Thules, of whome we spake before: the length of their feuerall raignes is not fet downe. After Thules, was the great Sefostris King twentie yeares. His successor was Pharao, called Narecho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeares, with which there passed from him the surname of 30 Pharae, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them; let their credit reft voon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are faid to have raigned in Acgypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whome I will not labour, as fearing more to beingprehended of vaine curiofitie, in the fearch made after these alreadie rehearsed, then of negligence, in omitting fuch as might have been eadded.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salamon; and Sefac, the afflicter of Rehoboam, leade vs againe into faire way, but not farre. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eufebius for it. clim.strom.l.t. 40 Thele give vs not the length of his raigne; but we know, that he lived in the times Euleb. de Prap.

of Dauid and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, tooke Gezar from Enanglig. c.4. the Canaanites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her fake per- 1. King 9.16.6 haps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sefae his forme 11.0.18,19,000. did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept fo many Wines and Concubines, bgfides this Aegyptian Princeffe. In the life of Rehoboam all hath-beene written that I finde of selae, excepting the length of his raigne, which must have beene fixe and twentic yeares, if he were that Smendis with whome Eufebius beginnes the one and twentieth Dynastic.

Now for a finuch as it would ferue to no great purpole, that wee knew the length 50 of Sefac his raigne, and of theirs that followed him, voleffe therewithall we knew the beginning of Selac, vpon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth yeare of Iehoaikem, King of Inda, in which Pharao Neco was flaine; I reckon vpwards the yeares of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sefae: by which accompt, the first yeare of Sefae is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons raigne, and the twentie fix tof Sefas with the fift of Reliaboum: wherein Sefac spoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, then Io. the Ifraelite and Craffus the Romane did; who, after him, spoyled the Temple of Ierusalem.

To hill up the time betweene Sefac and Neco, I have rather taken those Kings that I finde in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eufebius his Catalogue. For of these that are delinered by Enselines, wee finde no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, sauc onely of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to have beene a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the fuccellion is often interrupted in Enfebius by At- 10 thiopians, which got the Kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwife it appeares by the Prophet Efay, that the Councellors of Pharae did vaunt of the long and flourithing continuance of that house, infomuch, that they faid of Pharach. I am the Sonne of the Wife, I am the Sonne of the auncient King. But that which ouerthrowes the reckoning of Enfebius, is, the good agreement of it with his millaken times of the Kings of Iuda. For though it pleafe him well to fee how the raignes of Iofics and Neco meete by his computation, yet this indeede marres all . the raigne of Iofias being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting to compare the raignes of the Kings of Inda with theirs of Ifrael: by which occasion, Inram, King of Ifrael, is made to raigne three yeares after Abazia of Inda; Samaria is 20 taken by Salmanaffar before Hezekia was King : and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, have their beginnings placed in some other yeare of their collateralls than the Scriptures have determined.

Of CHEMMIS, CHEOPS, CEPHRENES, and other Kings recited by HERODOTUS and DIODORVS SICVLVS, which raigned betweene the times of REHO-BOAM and EZEKIA.

Collowing therefore the Greeke Hifforians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diocore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sefac. Hee raigned fifthe yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accompted one or this words.

The Pyramis bath his name from the shape, in that it resemblesha

toppe. This of Chemmis being foure-fquare, had a Bafe of feuen akers enery way, and was about fixe akers high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had 40 lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any injurie that it had fuffered by weather in follong space. From the raigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Cefar, wherein Diodorolined, are indeede a thoufand yeares; which gives the better likelyhood vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers teffifir that they have feene them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his fonne Chabreus fucceeded. Herodorus hath Cheeps (who might bee Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. Thefe are faid to have beene brethren; but the length of their raignes may argue the later to have beene 50 fonne to the former : for Cheops raigned fiftie yeares : Cephrenes fiftie lixe. Thefe were, as Chemmis had beene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who alreadie had oner laboured themselves in creeting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes; for those that raised them;

but the malice of the Egyptians is faid to have cast out their bodies; and to have called their Monuments by the name of an Heardfinan, that kept his Beatls thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entituling a poore Dist fellow to their workes, was held to be the calting out of their bodies : otherwife, it Hen is hard to conceive, how it might bee, that they, who had not power to avoide the like flauerie, laid vpon them by the yonger brother, or fonne, should have power or leifure to take fuch reuenge vpon his Predeceffor. To the like malice may be aferibed the tale denifed against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father wanting monie. did profitute her, and that thee, getting of every man that accompanied her, one to flone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that flood in the middeft of the other three. Belike thee was an infolent Ladie, and made them follow their drudgerie, for her fake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raifing a Monument. with the fuperfluitic of her Fathers prouitions.

emperimenthe fonne of Cephrenes, raigned after his Father fixe yeares. He would have built as his foregoers did, but prevented by death, finished not what hee had begunne. The people thought him a good King, for that he did fet open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept flut. But an Oracle threatned him with a first life of fixe yeares only, because of this his denotion; For (faid the Oracle) Agent (bould have beene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeares, which thy Predecessors no knew, and performed for their parts, but thou hast releafed it, therefore shalt thou line but five yeares. It is very firange, that the Gods should bee offended with a King for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countrie impious, when the people were defirous to ferue them; or that they having fo decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter dellinie, and make the ordinance of the Godsto faile in taking full effect. But these were Aegyptian Gods. The true Go D was, doubtlesses more offended with the restitution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeare of his Father Sefac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanitie of his Acgyptian Supersition? Sure it is that his raigne, and 20 theraignes of Cheops, and Cophrenes, were more long and more happic, than that of Myarinus, who, to delude the Oracle, reuelled away both daies and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into daies, and so doubled the time appointed: a feruice more pleafing to the Deuill, than the restitution of Idolatrieduril then feeme, when it could speede no better. I finde in Reineceius fiftie yeares alligned to this King; which I verily beleeue to have beene some errour of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other fuch ouer-fights: for I know no Author that gives him fo many yeares, and Reinectius himfelfe takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a shortlife, as is before shewed.

Boschorus is placed next vnto Myserinus, by Diodore, who speakes no more of him 40 than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his Predecessors in wit. Heisspoken of by divers Authors, as one that loved justice; and may be taken for that Banchyris, whom Suides commends in that kinde: Eufebius reckons foure and fortic yeares of his raigne.

After Boschorus, one Sabacus an Aethiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore: but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Afrehis; who made a tharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paied. This Afrehis made at Pyramis of brick, more coftly and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raifed. Belides this Afrehis, Herodotus placeth one Anylis, 50 ablinde man, before the Aethiopian. The raignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Aegyptians, to magnific their antiquities, accounted betweene Becchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but fixe yeares; and folong doth Functus, folong doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings, betweene them both, did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprobable, that the raignes of two Kings should have beene so soone spent; he may doe it by taking fome yeares from Sethon or Pfammeticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would breeden manifest inconvenience: for asmuch as part of sefae his raigne, must have beene in the fift of REHOBOAM; as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Ichoiakim, a. Chroning owne part I like it better to allow fixe yeares only to these two Kings, than to loose the witnesse of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speake of Senacheribs warre: at which time Sethon was King of Aegypt. I will not therefore adde yeares vnto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three yeares, wee shall thrust the beginning to of sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Aegyptian Kings. Otherwife it were a matter of no great enuic, to leave both Affichis and Anylis out of the roll; which were casily done, by placing Selse lower, and extending his life yet fixe yeares further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall be required of Pfammeticus his raigne) into the yeares of Rehoboam.

Of Sabieus the Aethiopian, who tooke the Kingdome from Amylis, it is agreed by the most, that he raigned fiftie yeares. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but impoling bondage and bodily labour vpon malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out 22 their feruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vie than pompe, to the fingular benefit of the Countrey. Zonaras calls this King Sna, the Scriptures call him so. Hofes, the last King of Ifrael, made a League with him against Salmanassar, little to his good : for the Aegyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelite from destruction. It feemes, that the encroching power of the Afgrian, grew terrible to Account bout these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, having caten so farreinto Syria, in the raigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhapsit was in his daies (for his raigne beganne in the fourth of Menabem) that Phul himfelfedid make the first entrance into Palessina. This caused So to animate the halfe subdued 32 people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Succefforgaue them was so faint, that Senacherilis Embassador compared the Aegyptian succourtoa broken staffe of Reede. Such indeede had Hofea found it, and fuch Ezekia might haue found it, had hee not beene supported by the stronger staffe of Him, that rules all Nations with a rod of yron. It appeares by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Inda, of the Acgyptian forces, for Charrets and Horse-men; but this power, what soeuer it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Aegypt it felfe, which So left vnto Sethon his Succeffor, having now fulfilled the fiftie yeares of his raigne. Herodotus and Diodorus haue both one tale, from the relation of Aegyptian Pricits, concerning the departure of this King; faying, that he 40 left the Countrie, and willingly retired into Aethiopia, because it was often signified vnto him in his dreames, by the God which was worthipped at Thebes, that his raigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse he slew all the Priests in Acgypt; which rather than to doe, he refigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Aegyptian Gods were of a strange qualitie, that so ill rewarded their Servants, and invited Kings to doc them wrong. Well might the Aegyptians (as they likewife did) worship Dogs as Gods, when their chiefe Gods had the propertie of Dogs, which love their Mastersthe better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have fained this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some deuise, of the fearefull old man, who feeing his Realme in danger of an invalion, fought an 50 honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himselfe into Aethiopia, where he had beene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the Aethiopis into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armic against Senacherib, when hee meant to inuade Agypt, within two or three yeares after? But I will not trouble my selfe with such enquirie. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus, was not indeede an Ethiopian (for in his time lined the Prophet E/ay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs house) but only so surnamed for his education, and because illuing from thence, he got the Kingdome from Anyfe, who was his opposite. The quiet and milde forme of his Gouernement; his holding the Kingdome fo long without an Armie; and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally hee hetooke to a private life, or whether hee fore-went his Life and Kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speake of sethon his next Suc-10 ceffor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a fure token of his hauing beene King.

of Sernon who raigned with Ezekin, and fided with him against

He first yeare of Sethons raigne falls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fift of Senacherib. It was a troublefome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of Asyra and Asyr, being then in-gaged in a Warre, the filue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serve. The Asyrian had the better men of warre; the Agyptian, better provision of necessaries : the Afgrian, more Subjects ; the A-ayptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Ajjur, maniethat were Agyptian in heart, though Afgrian in outward frew.

Of this last fort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemie, preserved the friendship of so neare and mightie a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet sarre 30 removed King. But herein was great difference, betweene Ezekia and his Subjects. For the good King, fixing his especiall confidence in God, held that course or policie, which hee thought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrie : the multitude of Indea, looking into the faire hopes which this Egyptian league promifed, were puffed vp with vaine conceits, thinking that all was fare, and that now they should not neede to feare any more of those injuries, which they had suffered by the Affrians, and so became forgetfull of God, taking counfaile but not of him. Elargo. The Prophet Efar complained much of this prefumption; giving the people of Indatovnderfland, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Horfes fielb, and not Spirit; that God himselfe should defend Israel vpon repentance, and that 40 Assva Should fall by the fivord, but not of man. As for the degyptimes (faid the Elegania & 8 Prophet) they are vanitie, and they shall helpe in vaine, their strength is to Euryon.

According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treatie of Confederacie that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and affurance was given to the Ienes, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with fuch reports, of Horses and Charrets, that they did not looke (as Efay faith) auto the holy one of Ifrael, nor feeke 1/431-122 unto the Lord. But he yet is wifest.

After a while came Senacherib with his Armie, and wakened them out of these dreames; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neare as he was, did feeme farre off, 30 being vnreadic, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seeme that he purposed, rather to make Palastina than Aegypt the stage, whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Apprians and Ienes, weakening one another, should yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage ouer both. Yet he fought with menie; for he sent Horses and Camells laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Ejay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeede; for (belifier that it seemes by the same place of Ejay, that the rich treassers missers and riell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tribases, all the strong Cities of inda were taken by Senatherib, except Libra, Luchis, and terujalem it selte, which were in sore diffresh, till the sword of God, and not of Man, destated the Assirtant, who did goe, for fanctio has Towers, that is, he fled to Ximue, where he was staine. Concerning this expedition of Semelecrib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against £gypt, where the men of warre, being offended with sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, resulted to beare arms indesence of him and the Countrie; that Sethon being ruleum Priest, bemoaned himse set on his God, who by dreame promised to send him helpers; that hereupon sethor, with such as would follow him, (which were crasts-men, stop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelusums, and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Campe of Semelers by night, did so knaw the bowes, quituers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were faine the next day to slie away in all hasse, shading themselues distributed. In memoric hereof scale the local status of this king is set up in the Temple of Valeun, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription. Let him, that schools are, so we can.

wherein how farre they swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnific their 23

owne King, it may cafily be perceived. It feemes that this Image of Sethon was fallen downe, and the tale forgotten in Diologous his time, or elfe perhaps, the Priefls did forbeare to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Lower was then well knowne to the world, whereof every child could have told.

how much falsehood had been mingled with the truth.

We finde this hiftorie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Senacherib King of the Afgrians, and Arabians, (fo Herodotus calleth him : the Syriansor peraduenture some borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Agypt, and was miraculoufly driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Fulcan did vnto his Priest; 30 happy it was (if Seehon were a Priest) that he tooke his God now in so good a moode. For within three or four yeares before this, all the Priests in Agypt should have beene flaine, if a mercifull King had not spared their lives, as it were halfe against the Gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to serve as an example, that might flirre up the Agyptians to pietic, seeing that their denotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Senseberib himselfe, and that the Moule in his hand, fignified Hieroglyphically (as was the Agyptian manner of expression things) the shamefull iffue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of 40 God, shewed vpon this vngodly King, was indeede a very good motive to pictie. But the embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon, finding him felfe in danger, did call vpon his Gods, that is, vpon Fulcan, Serofis, or any to whom he had most deuotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like neede : yet which of them had obtained fuccour by the like miracle? Surely the Ienes (even such of them as most were given to Idolatrie) would have beene ashamed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Charrets of Agypt, he- 50 canse they were many, and in the Horse-men, because they were very strong; had it beene told them, that Sethon, in flead of fending those Horse men and Charrets, was befeeching Vulcan, to fend him and them good luck, or elfe (for the fe also were Agretian Gods) addressing his praiers to some Onyon or Cat. How socuer it was, doubtlesse the prophecie of Esis tooke effect, which said, They shall be all assumed of the peo-1197 sost, plets that cannot prosit them, nor sheep, nor doe them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisedome, when resting secure up-pon promision that it selles hath made, it will no longer seeme to shand in neede of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to have beene set down by Eusebius, under the

Some there are who take Sethom to have beene feet downe by Eufebius, vnder the name of Tarsebus the Ethiopius, and therefore the twentie yeares which are given to Tarsebus ethe Ethiopius, and therefore the twentie yeares which are given to Tarsebus, they allow to the raigne of Sethom. The le have well observed, that Tarsebus the Ethiopius is mentioned in the Seriptures, not as a King of EEZpt, buts 10 a friend to that Countrie, or at leaf an enemie to Senaterio bin the water laft spoken of: the Ethiopius (as they are englished) over which hee raigned, being indeede Chuster or Arabans. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Ensebus hat missaken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Tarsebus or Tirbuka, is placed in the roome of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twentie yeares of Tarsebus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Ethiopius (as he is called) beganne his raigne ouer Egzpt, by Eusebus his accompt, after the death of Senatherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeare of Manasses King of Inda. Therefore he, or his yeares, have no reference to Sethon.

Herodelus forgets to tell how long Sethon raigned; Functions peremptorily, citing no Author, nor alleaging reason for it, sets him down thirtie three yeares; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded wnto my selfeat the first, for measuring the raignes of the set segretar Kings. The yeares which passed from the sit of Reholeam, who the fourth of tehnakim, I so duited among the **Espriam*, that giving to every one the proportion allowed wnto him by the Author in whom hee is sound, the rest is to bee conferred youn him whose length of raignes is necetaine; that is youn this Sethon. By this accompt I finde the thirtie three yeares, that are set down to by sentime, to agree very nearely, if not precisely, with the time of Sethons raigne; therefore I conforme my owner cekoning to his, though I could be content to haucit one yeare less. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psimmiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this Historie will shortly bring me; the &.

courfe of this Hiftorie will shortly bring me; the £gyptian affaires growing now to be centerlaced with the matters of Inda, to which it is meete that I re-

turne.

Of MANASSE and his Contemporaries.

ò. I.

The wickednesse of MANASSES. His imprisonment, Repentance.

A NASSE, the Sonne of Ezechias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperitie which followed him, fet vp, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Deuill was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, hee himselfe esteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the hoft of Heauen, as Gods, and 20 worshipped them : and of all his acts the more abhominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Deuill Moloch, or Melcher, in the Valley of Hinnon , or Benhennon : wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Deuills.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witch-crast and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintayned those that had familiar Spirits, and all forts of Enchanters; belides, he fhed so much innocent bloud, as Ierusalem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abhominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reuerent Prophet Efay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the level 30 18th, Marys. adittme, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neare vnto the Foun-Ghan pug. 175 taine of Siee to be fawne in funder, with a wooden faw, in the eightieth years of his Tartoll, de Pai, lifeta crueltie more barbarous and monftrous then harb beene heard of. The Scriptures indeede are filent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Islove, Eu-2.chron.33.11: febius and others, too many to rehearfe, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captaines of the Hoft of the Kings of Ashva, which tooke MINASSE, and put himin fetters, and bound him in chaines, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twentie yeare as a captine, and dispoiled of all honour and hope; yet to his heartie repentance and continuall praier, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moued the Assyrians heart to deliver him.

It is a fo likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechia, was the casilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie & estate. After which and when he was againe chablished, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detefted his former foolish and deuillish Idolatrie, and cast downe the Idolls of his owneerection prepared the Altar of God, and sacrificed thereon. He repaired a great part of serufalem: and dyed after the long raigne of fiftie five yeares. Glycas and Suidas report, that Clansife was held in a case of yron by the Asyrians: and therein sedde with bread of branne

of troubles in Egypt following the death of SETHON. The raigne of PSAMMITICUS.

Hat the wickednesse of King Manasses was the cause of the euill, which fell vpon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needes beleeue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the flate of things. lecue: for it is annine in the Scripe in the feath of the World, fuch, at that time, as would have invited in those parts of the World, fuch, at that time, as would have invited for the feath of the world of the feath of the f any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Alerodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owne ends) desirous of enlarging his Empire, to makeattempt vpon Iuda. For the Kingdome of Agypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of Inda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civill diffention, and after two yeares, ill amended by a division of the government betweene twelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these,eleuen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally fubdued by him, who made himfelfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Agypt, with the division of the Kingdome following it, is 20 placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the raignes of Sabacus, and Planmitions: but Herodotus doth fet the Ariflocratic, or twelve Governours, immediately before Plammitieus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this diffention feemes to have been the vicertainctic of title to that Kingdome (for that the Crowne of £gypt paffed by fuccession of bloud, I have often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not fetled, vntill one had obtained the Soueraignetic.

These twelue Rulers gouerned fifteene yeares, in good seeming agreement, which to preferue, they made firait couenants and alliances one with another, being jealous of their effate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should 30 depofe all the reft, noting him by this token, that he should make a drinke offering, in Valcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whileft this vnitie lafted, they joyned together in raifing a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built neare unto the Lake of Maris; a worke to admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it affirmes) no wordes could give it commendation, answerable to the statelinesse of the worke it felfe. I will not here fet downe that unperfect description, which here latur makes of it, but thinke enough to fay, that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he faith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephefus, or and the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorm reports this Labyrinth to have been worke of Marus, or Menides, a King which lived flue generations before Pro-

40 Lui, that is, before the Warre of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (faith he) Dedalus tooke the patterne of that which he made for Minos in Creete. Who this Marie, or Menides was , I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue beene Annemenes, which raigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus and Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, defiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Charemen, and others, that are found in Tolephus, touching Amenophis and his children, to the floric of A- Income Applie mass, and Attisares the Athiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethons Amenophis, to be Dieder' his Amafic, that Section thould be Actifanes, and that Annemenes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude 50 a conjecture; the times which we now handle, are those, about which Reineceus hatherred in making fearch; Amalis was Anylis; Actifanes was Sabacin; and Maries was one of these twelue Princes, to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actifanes the Athiopian deposed Amasis; Sabacus the

Athiopian deposed Anysis; Attifanes gouerned well, and was milde in punishing orlendors, fo likewife was Sabaeus; Alarus the next King after Actifanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (fauing Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabaeus, performed the fame worke, according to Herodorus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, which was familiar with them, in multiplying there a part of the Experior vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boatting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumflances remembree by Herodorus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to prove, that it was the worke of these twelve Princes. But I halten to their end.

At a folemne feaft in *Valent* Temple, when they were to make their drinke-of-crings, the Prieft, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cups. Hereupon *Pfammitiens* who itanding last, had not a Cup* tooke of this brasen Helmet, and therewith supplyed the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him yon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbase to kill him, but, being jealous of their citate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euen, is held by *Docate* as a fable, which I beleeve to have been none other: In the rest *Herosless* and *Diodoreagree*, saying, that *Pfammitius* hyred* Souldiers out of *Curis* and *Joins*, by whose aide he vanquished his Companions, and 20 made himselfie fole King.

The yeares of his raigne, according to *Hero-latur*, were fiftie foure; according to *Eurlehun*, fortie foure; *Mercator*, to reconcile the fet woo, gives fortie foure yeares to his fingle raigne, and ten to his ruling, joynthe with the Princes before fpoken of Indeeds, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for hee cannot in reason be fippofed to have been then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelve Gournours, must be thought to have lived vnto extreme old age, if hee ruled partly with otherspartly alone, threefore and nine yeares. I therefore yeeld rather to *Eufehun*, but will not aduenture to cut flue yeares from the *Arifeerstate*, though peraduenture *Pfammiticus* was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or 70 as next of bloud) into the place of fome Prince that dyed, and was ten yeares companion in that government.

Another Gruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeares of the Georgians, as we finde them fet downe, are more by one, than Grue to fill y phe time, betweene the fift of *Rehobam, and the fourth of *teheialim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeare from *Sethons raignes; that was of vncertaine length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Fams.*im. may have followed Exter authoritie than I know, or than himselfe alleageth, in giving to *Sethons* a time so nearely agreeing with the truth) wee must consound the last yeare of one raigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent, 40 For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set downe in Chronologicall tables, raigned precisely so many yeares as are asched vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the surphisage of one mans time. Supplied the decret of anothers. Wherefore I consound the last yeare of those fifteene, wherein the twelue Princes ruled, with the first of *Psamminus*; who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himself is Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Azept, who entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that he retayned in pay his Mercenaries of Carns, Jons, and Arabis, to whom hee gaue large rewards and possessions; and that 19 he greatly offended his Azeppian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Sprit. Vipon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, for sooke their natural Countrie of Ægypt, and went into Æthnopia, to dwell there: neither could they be reuoked by kinde Meflages, nor by the King himfelfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when hee told them of their Countrie, their Wiues, and Children, *they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrie, and that nature had enabled them to get other wiues and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to bee brought up in such some such with the reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such some what Nation or Language was most ancient; for a fine men six he considered the children to speake that language, which men spake at the children tried, Becaus, which wend being found to signific Bread in the Phrygian tongue, ferued greatly to magnific the Phrygian antiquitie. Con opins Because makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low Dutch; in which the word Becker, signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne over any part of Goropus his works, may finde enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Admand all the Patriarchs, seed none other tongue than the Low Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel, the name it selfs of Babel, being also Dutch, and given by occasion of this confusion; for that there they beganne to bable, and all ke, one knew not what.

But I will not infift you all that is written of Pfammitieut. The most regardable 20 of its acts was the slege of Asotus in Palsstims, about which he spent nine and twentieverers. Neuer haue we heard (faith Herodoins) that any Citic endured folong a slege as this; yet Pfammitieus carried it at the last. This Towne of Asotus had Epicoci been women by Tatan, a Captaine of Senscherib, and was now, as it seemeth relected, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

è. III.

What reference the see Agyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of MANASSES. In what part of his raigne MANASSES was taken prisoner.

Rere it certainely knowne, in what yeare of his raigne Manssfer was taken prisoner, and how long it was before hee obtayned libertie; I thinke wee should finde these Agyptian troubles to haue been of small occasion, both of his captiuitie and enlargement: God so disposing of humane actions, that even they, who intended only their owne bufineffe, fulfilled only his high pleasure. For either the civill warresin A-40 gype that followed upon the death of Sethon; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were into twelue peeces; or the warre betweene Pfammitieus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Pfammiticus into Syria, and the fiege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either fuch cause of hope, to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts, or fuch necessitie of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make fure worke with the King of Inda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the delinerie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Iosephus hath it) by subtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrie, but only wast it. So that the Ierres, hauing learned wit, by the ill fuccesse of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to 50 be more circumspect, in making their bargaine upon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Acryptian matters presented more weightic arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Juda could affoord, had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby hee should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quitting his present advantage over the Icares, hee might make his way the fairer into Acgypt.

Now concerning the yeare of Minaffes his raigne, wherein hee was taken prifener; or concerning his captinitie it selfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are illent. and tofephus gives no information. Yet I finde cited by Torniellus three opinions. the one of Bedarmine, who thinks that Manaffes was taken in the fifteenth years of his raigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirmes. that it was in his twentic feuenth yeare; the third, of Rabbi Kimbi vpon Ezekiel, who faith, that he was fortie yeares an Idolater, and lived fifteene yeares after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is vaheld by Tornielle, who rejects the second, 1. as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleaged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to favour the Cardmall, as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely diffent from him) than to have vied his accustomed dillgence in examining the matter, before he gaue his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that summon the Sonne of Manaffes, is faid by tofephies, to have followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manaffes growne old in his finnes, it is not like that hee flow dhane continued, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, Hee no reason, why the sinnes of Manaffes, might not be diffin- 20 guilhed from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve yeares old; though it were granted that hee continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimbi) vntill hee was but fifteene yeares from death. Touching the second; how socuer it be a searcfull thing, to saft off unto the last those good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ener God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the finnes, which are not for faken before the age of two and fiftie yeares, thall beepun fled with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Tornicslus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Man fee continued longer in this wickednesse, than Bellarmine hath intimated, if notasiong 40 as Rabbi Kimhi hath affirmed. In the fecond Booke of Kings, the cuill which OLLmasses did is remembred at large, and his repentance veterly omitted; so that his amendment may seeme to have taken up no great part of his life, the storie of him 2. King 21.17. being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the rest of the acts of MANASSES, and all that he did, and his simme that he sinned, are they not writtenin the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Inda. The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearling the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iehnskim, the great Grand-child of The 14.3.4. this Manasses, it is said; Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this woon lade, that he might put them out of his fight, for the sinnes of MANASSE, according to all that 40 he did, and for the innocent bloud that he fled ( for he filled terufalem with innocent bloud) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who fo confiders well these places, may finde fmall cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manaffes was no earlier than fifteene yeares before his death; or most probable, That when he was twentie seuen yeares old, he repented, and becomming a new man, liued in the scare of God fortie yeares after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, feeing that the truth cannot be discouered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeares of civill diffention in Aegypt, fourteene or fifteene yeares following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignetie; the warre of Pfammitiess against his Affociates; and fourcand twentic yeares, of the nine and twentic, 50 wherein the flege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manaffes, did leaue no one part of his raigne (after the first fifteene yeares) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Bubylenian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of viliting his Countrie. All which I will adde hereto is this; that the fifteenth of

Manaffes, was the last yeare of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Silerodach his raigne, or (accounting from the death of Afarhaddon) the twentieth: The feuen and twentieth of Manaffes was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach : his fortieth, was the twentie third of Pfammiticus. and the fift of Nabulaffar, the fonne of Merodach in Babylon ; but which of these was the yeare of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbeare to shew mine opinion, least I should thereby seeme to draw all matters over violently to mine owne

This was the first great mastric that the Babylonians had of the Kingdome of In-10 da. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanaffar, yet Ezechias neuer paved it. True it is, that hee hoped to flay Sennacheribs enterprise against him , by present and series ting him with three hundred talents of filter, and thirtie of gold, belides the plate which couered the dores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manaffes being preffed with greater necessities could refuse no tollerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose vpon him; among which it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of feruitude) that hee might not hold peace with the Egyptions, whilest they were enemies to Babylon. This appeares not only by his fortifying with men of warreall the firong Cities of Inda after his returne (which was rather against Planmiticus, whose partie hee had forsaken, than 20 against the Babylonian, with whom hee had thenceforth no more controuersie) but likewife by that opposition, which lofters made afterwards to Pharso Neco, in fauour of Nabulaffar, which had been against all reason and policie, if it had not been his dutie by couenant. Of this I will speake more in convenient place.

ò. IIII. ,

of the first and second Messenian Warres, which were in the raignes of Ezekia, and Manasses Kings of Inda were performed abroad in the world; about these times of Manasses, the most remarkeable were the Messes mism Warres; which happening in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Persian Warres, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian Warre beganne and ended in the daies of Ezekia; the second in the raigne of Manaffes: but to avoide the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is 40 needlesse, than to say, that the posteritic of tiercules, drining the issue of Pelops, and the Acheans, out of their feates, divided their lands betweene themselves, and crected the Kingdomes of Lacedamon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloudie Warres; whereof these Messenian were the greateft.

The pretended grounds of the Mellenian Warre, are learce worth remembrance; they were so sleight. Ambition was the true cause of it; wherewith the Lacedemonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour, to accomplish their greedie defires. Yet other matter was alleaged; namely, that one Polychares 50 a Messenian had flaine many Lacedamonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparte defiring to have him yeelded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Messenians on the other fide, excused Polychares, for that he was growne frantick, through injuties received from Eurphnes a Lacedamonian. This Eurphnes had bargained to give Paper to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gaine appointed, hee fold the Cattaile, and Slaues that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, faying, that they were stollen. Whilest the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the flaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedamonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large a. mends; which to receive, hee carried the Sonne of Polychares home with him; but hauing him at home, hee vilanously slew him. Wherefore, the Lacedemonars has uing refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, to doe him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell, out of those things, which he did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messenans, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vato the judgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counfaile of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedamonians, who had a great defire to occupie the faire Countrie of Meffene, that lay close by them, were not content with fuch allegations. They thought it enough, to have some shew for their doings. which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly tooke an oath, to hold warre with Mellene, till they had maltered it : which done, they feized vpon Amphia, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercic, very few elcaping.

Hereupon the Meffensans tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemie. A furious 20 battaile was fought betweene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with yncertaine victorie. The Messensans did strongly encampe themselves; The Lac. da. monians, vnable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre beganne in the fecond yeare of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourtenth Olympiad, hauing lasted twentie yeares. The two enemic Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedemonians waiting the inland parts of Meffene; and the Meffenians, the Sea coult of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both fides, were cailed in to helpe. The Arcadians, Argines, and Sicyonians, tooke part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a fecond, third, and fourth battaile 19 were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; sauing that, in the fourth battaile, the Lacedemonians were enforced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was still vincertaine, though in one of them the Messenians lost Emphaes their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many yeares were spent, ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of monieto entertaine Souldiers, caufed the Warre to linger. And for the fame reasons, did the Messenians, for sake all their inland Townes, excepting 1thome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vponit, able to endure more, than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authors tell vs, the Laced emonians were so obstinate, in this Warre, because of their vow, that having absented themselvesten 40 yeares from Sparta, their wives fent them word, that their Citie would grow vnpeopled, by reason that no children had beene borne them in all that time: Where-

★ vpon they fent back all their ablest yong men, promiseuously to accompanie the yong women, who got so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diedorus referres the begetting of these was the youn- Parthenians to a former time. But in processe of this Mellenian Warre, when the Degeft Some of uill in an Oracle had aduifed the Messenians to Sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of Crefifien by Me- * Agyptu, that fo they might be victorious against the Licedamonians; the lot salrope, the daughter of one Lycifeus, Epibolus the Priest, willing to saucher, said, King of Area- shee was only a fostered child, and not borne of the wife of Lycifcus: which answere 50 dia: of which giuing delay to the execution of the Maide, Lycifeus fecretly fled away with her into chiefe nobili- Sparta. Then Ariflodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his tir of the Alef- owne Daughter: but a yong Noble man, being in love with the Maide, when otherwise he could not prevaile, said openly that shee was no Virgin, but that he had befloured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters beily, to disproue the Louers slander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, afterward falling, by other superstitions, into despaire of prenailing against the Laced emonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Countrie, which he loued most dearely. For after his death the Mesienians lost their courage, and finding themselves diffressed by many wants, especially of victualls, they craued peace; which they obtained vnder most rigorous conditions. Halfe the yearely truits of their Land they were bound to fend vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wines, to make folcome lamentations, at the death of enery Spartan King; they to were also fworne to live in true subjection to the Lice amonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was given to the Afmai, and fuch as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon to vneuen termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirtie yeares it continued (the Meffenians not finding how to help themselues) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able yong men, that were growne up in the roome of those Messenians, whom the former Warre had confirmed, beganne to confider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lecedemonians, and therefore scorning to serue such Matters, as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe 20 of these was Aristomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the house of Apytes; who perceiuing the vniforme delires of his Countrie men, aduentured to become their Leader. He therefore founding the affections of the Ai gives, and Arcadians, which he found throughly answerable to his purpose, beganne open warre vpon the State of Lacedemon. This was in the fourth years of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedamonians, hasted to quech the fire before it shuld grow too hot with fuch forces as they could raife of their own, without troubling their Friends mening to deale with their Enemies, ere any fuccour were lent them. So a firong battaile was fought betweene them, and a doubtfull; faue that the Messenians were pleafed with the iffue, for a fmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, 30 to thinke them their equalls. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeare another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better prouided. The Lacedemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe : the Mellenians had the Argines, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Aristomenes did so behaue himselfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their lines. Of fuch importance was this victorie, that the Lacedemonians beganne to bethinke themselves, of making some good agreement. But one Tyrtais an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they 40 had gotten to direct them, reenforced their Spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes tooke by surprise a Towne in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of sparta, who did fet vpon him, in hope to have recovered the bootie. But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or furely the profit, fell vnto the Lacedemonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with monie, fled away, and left the Meffenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The loffe was fogreat, that together with Andanis their principal Citie, al the towns in Mesene, standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not bee 50 lafe abroade, was conucied, as into a place of lafetie. Here the Lated amonians found a tedious worke, that held them cleuen yeares. For befides that Era it felfe was a strong pecce, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the fiege. He wasted all the fields of Mesene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Leconia, taking away Corne, Wine, Cattaile, and all prouifions, necessarie for his owne prople; the Slaues and houlhold stuite he changed into monic, sustering the owners to redeeme them. To remedie this mischiefe the Lacedomonius made an Edd; that neither Assigne, nor the adjoyning parts of their owne Countrie, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost vindone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtem appeased this sproare with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenet grew so bold, that hee not only ranged overall the fields, but adventured upon the Townes, surprised, and fackt Amysla, and finally caused the enties to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likely hood of taking Em.

In performing these and other services, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner; yet still he escaped. One escape of his descrues to bee remembred, as a thing year strange and meruailous. Hee had with too much courage aduentured to Jetypon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Caue into which the Spartans vied to cast head-long, such as were condemned to die for the greatest offences. To this punilhment were Aristomenes and his Companions adjudged. All therest of these poore men dyed with their falls; Ariftomenes (how focuer it came to paffe) tooke no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungcon, among 20 dead carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while hee perceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the toppe) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead bodie. Hercupon hee bethought himselfe, that this beast must needes know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, faued him felfe from biting with the other hand, by thrufling his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loofe, ranne through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Ariftomenes delue fo long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage, 30 When some sugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale founded alike, as if they had faid, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedemonians in the fiege of Era, were cut in pecces, their Captaines flaine, and their Campe taken; then was it casily beiegued, that Ariflomenes was aliue indeede.

Thus cleuen yeares passed whilest the enemies hourring about Era, saw no likelyhood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had sled from Sparta, betraied the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rai- 40 nie-winter-night, that the husband came home vnlooked for, whileft the Adulterer was within. The Woman hiddeher Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the ftorme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leave their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Aristomene, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroade; neither was it to be seared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a darke-rainie-night, as this was. The slave that heard these tidings, role vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Campe with the newes. There hee found Emperatures his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him he vttered all; and obtaining pardon 50 for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreme darkenesse, together with the noise of winde and raine, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited, by neare hope of ending along worke; the other inraged by meere desperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the affiliance, which women and children (to whom the hatred of feruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the fireets and other paffages, which admitted not manie hands to fight at once. But the Alesenians were in continuall toile; their enemies fought in course refreshing themselues with meat and sleepe, and then returning supplied the places of their wearie fellowes, with fresh Companies. Aristomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men, for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as having beene three to dayes, and three nights, vexed with all miferies, of labour, watching, fighting, hunger, and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker fort, whom he compafied round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midflof the enemies. Emperanus Generall of the Lacedemonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, caused his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a faire paffage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arrived fafe in Arcadia, where they were most louingly entertained.

Vpon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Aradianshad prepared themselizes to the rescue; but Arisson extensions the first base to the rescue; but Arisson extensions a single state of the substantial was alreadies of the Aradianshad placed his followers in faktice, the chose to the bundred the lusticit of his men, with whom he resoluted to march in all secrethast with Sparta, hoping to find the Towne secure, and ill manured, the people being runne forth to the spoile of Messions. In this enterprise, if he speed well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedannians would beeg lad to recover their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others, if all saided, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred includes that offered to joyne with him, but Arisson extensions are said to the speed advertisement hereof, to Anasander King of Sparta. The Epistle which Anasander see back to Arisson extensions are some some all his falseshood, which being published in open 30 also might be Areadians stoned him to death, and calting forth his bodie vinbured, credted a monument of his treacherie, with a note. That the Periurer cannot decoine Sod.

Of Millomenes no more is remaining to be faid, than that committing his people to the charge of his sonne Gorgus and other sufficient Couernours, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, heresolved himselfs to make abode in those parts, hoping to find the Lacedemonians worke at home. His daughters hee belowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus who raigned in the sille of Rhodes took to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marrie the daughter of the belt man in Greece. Finally Aristomeus went with his daughter to Rhodes, where he purposed to have travailed vnto Ardys the Son of Gyes King of Lydis, and to Phrantes King of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Meffenians were inuited by Anaxilas (whose great Grandsather was a Meffenian and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Inhegians in Italie, to take his part against the Zandeansin Stellie, on the other side of the straights. They did so, and winning the Towne of Zande, called it Messiene, which name it keepes to this day.

This fecond Messenian warre ended in the first yeare of the twentie eight Olympiale. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home served to Lacedemoins found meanes to rebell; but were foone vanquished, and being driuen to forsake Pelepomessia, they went into Acamania; whence likewise, after sew ages they were expelled by the Lacedemoinan, and then sollowed, their uncient Countrimen into Italie and Sieilie, some of them went into Africa, where they chose who telmsselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourescore yeares, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta and loue of their forfaken Countrie, with a defire to returne vnto it. In the third yeare of the hundreth and fecond Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, haning tamed the pride of the Lacedemonians, revoked the Meffenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dweltabroad, into Pelsponnefus. There did Epaminon. das restore vnto them their old possession, and helpe them in building a faire Citic. to which, by the name of the Province, was called Meffene, and was helde by them cuer after, in despight of the Lacedemonians, of whom they never from thenceforth

> Of the Kingsthat were in Lydia and Media, while MANASSES Raigned. Whether DEIOCES the Medewere that A R-PH AXAD whih is mentioned in the Booke of IVDITH. Of the historie of IVDITH.

R DY'S King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Paufanias, as raigning thortly after the Meffenian warre. Ardys fuccee ding vnto his father Gyges, beganne his raigne of nine and fortie yeares, in the second of the fine and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steppes of his father, who enchroaching upon the lonians ini Alia. had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wanne Priene., and affailed Atiletus; but went away without it, In his raigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrie by the Southians, ouer-ranne a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand-child, by whom they were driven out. They 30 had not onely broken into Lydia, but wanne the Citic of Sardes; though the Cattle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long raigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to effect

Phraortes was not King untill the third yeare of the nine and twentieth Olumpiad, which was fixe yeares after the Meffenian warre ended; the fame being the laft yeare of Manaffes his raigne ouer Inda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these five and fiftie yeares in which Manaffes raigned. This Deieces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his predecessors 40 had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people lo much licence, as caused eueric one to desire the wholesome scueritie, of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his perfon, he feldome gaue prefence, which also when he did, it was with such austeritie, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies, he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiestie, which his Predecessours had almost letter fall, through neglect of due comportiments. In execution of his Royall Office, hee did vprightly and seucrely adminifler iustice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the King- 50 dome. Hee cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by enchroaching vpon others; but studied how to gouerne well his owne. The difference found betweenethis King, and fuch as were before him, feemes to have bred that opinion which Herodotus deliuers, that Deioces was the first who raighed in Media.

CHAP.27. S.5. of the Historie of the World.

This was he that built the great Citic of Echatane, which now is ealled Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Indith, as also Ben Alerodach, by the same accompt, should bee Nabuchodonofor the Afgreen, by whom Arphexad was flaine, and Holophernes fent to worke wonders; vpon Phud and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last yeare of Deiecesto have beene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, fome earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, fome later, in the raigne of Nabulal far, who is also called Nabuchodonofor.

In fitting this Booke of Indith to a certaine time, there hath much labour beene frent' with ill successe. The raignes of Cambyses Darius Hystaspis, Xeres and Ochus, have beene fought into; but affoord no great matter of likelihood : and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Ierusalem, have beene thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot (I speake of such as faine would) agree with him-Whileft Cambyfes raigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the florie of Inaith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Aerxes, are acknowledged to have beeneverie fauourable to the lewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonofor, whose part they refused to take, and who fent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes bath some conneniences, aptly fitting 10 this Historie; and about all the opinion of a few Ancient writers ( without whose indgement the authoritie of this Bookewere of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the raingne of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, verie few, and they faintly, entitle him to the bulineffe. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be, a returne from captimitie lately foregoings the Temple rebuilt: Incim High Pricit, and along peace, of threescore and tenne yeares or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the tenes. Likewise on the other side wee must finde a King that raigned in Ninime, eighteene yeares at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refused to affift; one that fought to bee generally adored as 30 God, and that therfore commanded, all temples, of fuch as were accounted gods to be destroyed; one whose victoric or Captaine Generall knew not the Iewish Nation, but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances, the Priesthood of Ioacim, with a returne from Captiuitic, are found concurring, with either the time of Atanasses before the destruction of lerufalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the raigne of Xernes; the rest of circumstances requilite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captiuitie of the Jewes and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuerfic is, that the Booke of Indith is not Canonicall. Yet hath Tornielles done 40 as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that vnder Xerxes there were other Kings , among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps reftored and reedified the Citie of Echstane, that had formerly beene built by Desoces) and Nabuchodonofor might be another. This granted; he addes that from the twelfth yeare to the eight centh of Nabuchodonofor, that is fine or fixe yeares, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Gracian expedition (which he supposeth to have beene so long) might give occasion vnco drphaxad, of rebelling : and that Nabuchodonofor having vanquished and slaine Aphaxad, might then feek to make him selfe Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth vnder Holofernes. So should the Jenes have done their dutic, in adhering to Nerxes their 30 Soueraigne Lord, and refifting one that rebelled against him; as also the other ircumstances, reheaased before be well applyed to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Historic of Iudith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonofor, might well enough bee ignorant of the Jewes, and as

beliefe, from this coniccture : and the supposition it selfe is verie hard, that a rebell. whose King was abroad, with an Armie contisting of seventeene hundred thoufand men, thould prefume fo farre, you the itrength of twelve hundred thouland foot, and twelve thouland Archers on horlebacke, as to thinke that he might doe what he lift, yea that there was none other God than himfelfe. It is indeed eafie to find enough that might be faid against this deuise of Torniellus; yet if there were anie necessitie, of holding the Booke of Indith, to bee Canonicall, I would rather to chuse to lavatide all regard of prophane Histories, and build some detence voon this ground, than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it felfe. That Incith lived under none of the Perfian Kings, Bellamine (whose workes I have not read, but find him cited by Tornicline) bath prooued by many argumens. That shee lived not in the Raigne of Manasses, Torniedus hath prooued verie substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driuen, as it were to breake through a wall, in faying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphanal and Nabuchodonofor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meere fantalie, it is fo plaine, that it needs no proofe at all. Wherefore we may truly fay, that they which have contended about the time of this Hittorie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stonic field) I have chased Hielosernes out of all parts of time, 20 and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni folique vists, in an age that never was, and in places that were neuer knowne.

Surely to find out the borders of IAPHETH, which were towards the South, and ouer against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Coimographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not buile my felfe herewith; having alreadie fo farre digreffed, in shewing who lived not with Manasses, that I thinke it high time, to returne vnto mine owne worke, and rehearfe what others I finde, to have had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

a Salyne chosen; a peaceable man and seeming verie religious in his kind. Hee brought the rude people, which Romelus had employed onely in warres, to some good civilitie, and a more orderly fashion of 40 life. This hee effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies, which hedelinered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were, in his owne judgement, no better than meere delutions, that ferued onely as rudiments, to bring the Sauage multitude of theeues and out-lawes, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to some forme of milder difcipline, than their boysterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his grave, almost fixe hundred yeares after his death, wherein the Superfittion taught by himfelfe was condemned as vaine. His graue was opened by chance, in digging a pecce of ground that 50 belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffines or Chefts of stone were init, with an infeription in Greeke and Latine letters, which faid that Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompo, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his bodie being vtterly confumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped up in two bundels of wax; of his owne constitutions scueu, and other scuen of Phylofothie. They were not onely uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie defiring to have a fight of these Bookes, when hee perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliuer them backe to the owner, and offered to take a folemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vse. Hereupon the Senate, without more a doe, commaunded them to bee openly burnt. It feemes that Auma did meane to acquite himfelfe, vnto wifer ages which he thought would follow, as one that had not beene to foolish as to believe the Doctrine wherein he infructed his owne barbarous times. But the poylon wherewith hee had infected 10 Rome, when hee fat in his Throwne, had not left working, whenhee ministred the Antidote out of his grave. Had these Bookes not come to light, untill the dayes of Tully and Cafar, when the mift of ignorance was somewhat better discuffed; likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peraduenture generall) effect. Being as it was, they ferued as a confutation, without remedic, of Idolatrie that was inuctorate.

Auma Raigned three and fortic yeares in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hosijlius the third King was chosen, in the fix and fortieth of Manages, and R aigned two and thirtie yeares, bufied, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field, but in regard of the danger, which both parts had 20 cause to seare, that might grow vnto them from the Thuseanes, caused them to bethinke themselves of a course, whereby without essution of so much bloud, as might make them too weake for a common enemie, it might bee decided, who fhould command, and who obev.

There were in each Campe three Brethren, Twinnes borne at one birth (Dionyfins fayes that they were Colen Germans) of equall yeares and strength, who were appointed to fight for their feuerall Countries. The end was that the Horatii, Champions for the Romans got the victorie, though two of them first lost their lines. The three Curatij that fought for Alba (as Linie tels it) were all aline, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were flaine: but the third Hora-30 tims, pretending feare, did runne away and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts could not follow him with equall speede, to follow him at fuch diflance one from another, that returning upon them, he flew them, as it had beene in fingle fight, man after man, ere they could joyne together and fet vpon him all at once. Dionyfus reports it fomewhat otherwife, telling verie particularly, what woundes were given and taken, and faying, that first one of the Horatij was slaine, then one of the Curaty, then a fecond Horatius, and lailly the two Curaty, whom the third Horatius did comming scuer one from the other as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable thinges in the olde Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it felfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, against Al-43 ba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citic of Alba did immediatly become subject vnto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, vpon some treacherous dealing of their Gouernour, vtterly razed, the people being remooued vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had beene chiefe, became ere long dependent vpon Rome, though not subject vnto it, and diugrse pettie States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbeare to rehearse (as being the works of sundrie ages, and few of them remarkeable confidered apart by themselves (vntill fach time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, thall grow to bee the maine subject of to this Historic.

The feuenth yeare of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the fitth of Manafso. Also the three last Gouernours for tenne yeares, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find onely the names, Leocrates, Apfander, and Erizias. After Erixias yearely Rulers were elected.

He caused all the Images, as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them: and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. Hee also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses 30 of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iofias it was prophecied, in the time of Iereboam the first, when he creefed the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be borne vnto the house of David, Josius by name, and upon thee (faid the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall hee facrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incense upon thee . a prophecie verie remarkeable. In the eighteenth yeare of his Raigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Jeofes, called Deuteronomie, or, of the Lame, which hee fent to the King: which when hee had caused to bee read before him, and considered of the seuere commaundements therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that observe them, and the fortow and extirpation to the reft, he rent his garments, and commaunded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, concerning the Booke, who answered the meffengers in these words. Thus faith the Lord, behold I will bring outle ponthis place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curfes that are written 2.6bran. 34.14. in the Booke, which they have read before the King of Iuda, because they have for saken mee, and burnt incense to other Gods. > Athens; I hope I thall not need excuse, for varying from Paulanius, who settes the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner. In the Raigne of Manaffes it was, that Midas, whome the Poets fained to have had Affes cares, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Manie fables were deuifed of him: especially that hee obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all thinges which hee should touch, might immedatly be changed into Gold: by which meanes heelad like to have beene starued (his meat and drinke being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from his miscrable facultie, by causing him to wall himselfe in the River Pactolus, the streame whereof hath ever since for 22 footh, abounded in that precious Mettall. Finally it is faid hee died by drinking Buls bloud; being inuaded by the Seythians. In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (faith Plutarch in the life of Rome-

lus) observed the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome. The Milefians, or (as Erfebius hathit) the Athenians, having obtayned some power by Sea, founded Macieratis a Citie on the coaft of Agypt. Plammittens herein feemes to have affilted them, who vied all meanes of drawing the Greekes into Ægypt, accounting them his furest strength. For neither Miletes, nor Athens, were now of power fufficient, to plant a Colonie in Fgypt by force.

Countres, that had beene part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Yet I doe not thinke, that any victorie of Iofias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekiss, after the flight and death of Senachersb, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Aarhandon, did vie the aduantage which the faction in the North prefented vnto him, and laid hold vpon fo much of the Kingdome of Ifrael, as hee was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with Planimitieus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the fiege of Azolus though the Towne held out nine and twentic yeares) did give you to Manafes, together with his libertie as much in Ifrael, as himfelfe could not eafily defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Iuda had fo 10 long held with those of Agypt, by casting a bone betweene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territorie with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendship of the Ierres, which had beene lost by injuries done, in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is faid, that Manasies did s.cbron.33.14. after his deliverance from imprisonment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Inda; it may be that some such butinesse is intimated, as the taking possession. and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manufelt that he tooke much paines, in making lerufalemit felfe more defensible, yet I should rather belowe, that he having alreadic compounded with the Babylonian, did fortilie himfelfe against the Agyptians, whose side hee had forsaken, than that hee travailed in ac making fuch prouitions, onely for his minds fake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manafer had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was upon such friendly tearmes, as required not only a faithfull observation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perswasions could fuffice to make Iofics fit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Plarao Neco King of Agypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The last yeare of Iolias his Raigne it was, when as Neco the fonne of Pfanmitiess, came with a powerfull Armie towardes the border of Indea, determining to 2.chron. 35.20, paffe that way being the nearest toward Euphrates, either to strengthen the passes 20 of that River, about Careenifb or Cercufium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this; Dioclefian is faid by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done) or perhaps to inuade Striatt felfe. For it feemethe that the travaile of Pfammittens had not beene idlely confumed about that one Towns of Azotus, but had put the Agyrians in possestion of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adades Kings of Damafeo.

Neither was the industrie of Neco leffe than his Fathers had beene, in pursuing the warre against Esbel. In which warre, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affaires and hopes : the extraordinarie valour of the mercenarie Greekes, that were farre better Souldiers than Legyl could of it film afford; and the danger wherein Affria flood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and thew what it could doe. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance them was the warre; as in place more concepient shall be noted. At the present it seems, that either some preparation of the Chaldeans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disabilitie of theirs to make resistance, did invite the King of Agret, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates, whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mightic

These two great Monarchs, having their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Jofies aduited with himselfe to which of 50 these he might adhere, having his Territorie set in the mid way between both, so as the one could not inuade the other, but that they must of necessitie tread vpon the verie face and bodie of his Countrie; Now though it were fo that Necohimfelfe defired by his Embaffadors, leave to paffe along by Indea, protefting that hee directed himselfe against the Assyrians onely, without all harmefull purpose against 10.23; yet all fufficed not, but the King of Ifrael would needs fight with him. Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hojes the last King of ifrael, who when he fell from the dependance of the Affirian, and wholly truned to Sabaeus or Sous King of Agypt, was veterly disapointed of his hopes, and in conclusion loft both his life and chate, which the Affyrian, fo rooted vp and tare in neeces, as it could neuer after bee gathered together or replanted. The calamities alfo that fell your Inda in the thirteenth and foureteenth yeares of Ezekia, whileft to that good King and his people relied upon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manalles, were documents of fufficient proofe, to show the ill affurance, that was in the helpe of the Egyptians, who (neare neighbours though they were) were alwayes vireadie; when the necessities of their friends required their affiflance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Accound not seeke, to haue the lewes renew there ancient league with him, but onely craued that they would be contented to fit ftill, and behold the pattime betweene him and the Affyvians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Armie as did, foone after this, out-face Nabulaffar, vpon his owne borders, left vnto the 19-3, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to give it any checke vpon the 20 way. Wherefore I beleeue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iofias . was not firred up onely by politicke respects, to stop the way of Aees; but thought himselfe bound in faith and honour, to doe his best in defence of the Babylenian Crowne; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlagement of Manaffes, or by the gift of fuch part as hee held in the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Inda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians, what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemie. Somethinke, that this action of Iolias, was contrarie to the aduice of Ieremie 30 the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Icremie, nor can finde reafon to beleeve. Others hold opinion, that he forgat to aske the counfell of God: and this is verie likely; feeing hee might beleeue that an enterprife grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulne fle due to the King of Bibel, could not bee displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wicked neffe of the people (in whom the corruptions of formertimes had taken such roote, as all the care of Iolias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp ) was questionlesse farre from hearkning how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life stood betweene them and their punishment, should now bee taken from among them, and that in 40 fuch fort, as his death should give enterance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauying all the strength hee could make, neare vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Aunsses, encountered Neebo: and there he received the Broke of death, which lingring about him till hee came to Ieru/alem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Inda, es. Landtenas ace pecially of Ieremie the Prophet: who inferted a forrowfull remembrance thereof of PHARAO NECO, that fought with Iosias: Of IEHOARAS and IEHOIAKIM Kings of Inda

F these warres, and particularly of this victoric, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Redfea. It should have reached about a hundred miles in to length, and beene wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middeft of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Ness to desist when halfe was done. There were confumed in this toile some businesse twelue hundred thousand Agyptians; a losse great enough to make the King for fake his enterprise, without troubling the Oracle for admonition : How socuer it were he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and leavied a great Armie, wherewith hee marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he yled the feruice, as well of his Nauic, as of his landforces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, faue onely this victoric against Iofias, where Herodotus cals the place Alagdolus, and the Iemes Sy- 20 rians; which is a small errour, seeing that Indaa was a Province of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to have beene the fame place (though diverfly named) in which this battaile of fought. After this, Accus tooke the Citie of Cadytis, which tof. Ant. Luc. 1, to was per haps Careberrift, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as lo/ephus witneffeth.

Particularly we finde, that the Phanicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they furrounded all Africa, fetting faile from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and lowed corne for their fullenance, in that great voyage which lasted three yeares. This was the first nauigation about Africa, 30 wherein that great Cape now called Of good hope was discovered; which afterwas forgotten, vntill I afco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phanicians held, for they, beginning in the East, raune the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the straights of Gybraltar, having Africke still on the right hand : but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same straights, leave Africke on the Larboard, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phanicians, which Herodotus durst not believe, how the Sunne in this journie was on their right hand, that is, on the Northlide of them, is a matter of necessarie truth; and the observation then 40 madehercof, makes mee the better to beleeue, that fuch a Voyage was indeed

But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what he did, in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Inda, while the Agyptians were bufie at Curchemift, had made Iehoahaz their King, in the roome of his father lofus. The Prophet Ieremie cals this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Raigne of shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallam of Ifrael Raigned but one moneth; Icheahaz no more than three. Hee was not the eldest sonne of Iosias: Wherefore it may seeme that he was set up as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the 50

3. Kine. 34. v. 32 Fryptian, as appeares by the fequell. An Idolater he was, and thriued accordingly. For when as Neve had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Indea. This Countrie was now so farre from making any reful, that the King himselfe came to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter went foill on his fide, that Aeco did cast him into bonds and carrichim prilonerinto Egypt, giuing away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. This Citie of Riblath, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Iuda, as may bee obserned in diners examples. Yet here Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, fince he could no better vieit. But how euer Iehoiakim thriued by the bargaine, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too stoute to give him peace. when he defired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater 10 taske lying upon his handes, than would permit him to wast his forces upon Indea: but now the reputation of his good successe at Mexiddo, and Carchemist, together with the diffention of the Princes Iofias his fonnes (of whom the eldeft is probably thought to have flormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gave him power to doe, euen what should please himselfo. Yet hee did for beare to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps upon the fame reason, which had made him so earnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Terres had fuffered much, in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driven to for fake that partie, and joyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselues faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime 20 them; feeing they were fuch a people, as would not vpon eueric occasion shift side. but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth thould lay vpon them : so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuertheleffe he laid vpon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of filuer, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leave vnto them some document in the future, of greater punishment then verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So hee departed, carrying a long with him into £gypt the vnfortunate King tehoahaz, who died in his Capti-

The Raigne of Ichoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeare; o-30 therwife it would hardly be found, that Ieboiakins, his successour, did R aigne tenne whole yeares; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that is current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short Raigne, into the first yeare of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to bee voworthie of disputation; and so I leave it.

Iehoiainm in impictie was like his brother, in faction hee was altogether £gyptsan, as having received his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these lait Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall wordes, with reference to all the cuill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that 40 the poyfon wherewith Abaz and Manaffes had infected the Land, was not to expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Josius, but that it still cleaned vnto the chiefe of the people, Yea unto the chiefe of the Priefts alfo; and therefore it was not firange, that 2. Chron.cap 35. the Kings had their part therein. The Royallauthoritie was much abased by the softis dangers wherein the Countrie stood, in this troublesome age: the Princes did in a manner what they lifted; neither would the Kings forbeare to professe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him infolent and cruell; as we find by that example of his dealing with Vria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes doe appeare to have been infligators. This Holy man denounced Gods judgements a-50 gainst the Citie, and Temple, in like fort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into sypt: but fuch regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was delinered vnto his

Embassadour, and sent backe to the death; contrarie to the custome vsed, both in those dayes and fince among all Civill Nations of giving refuge vnto strangers. that are not held guiltie of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priviledge.

It concerned Pharao to give all contentment possible to Iehojakira for the rian Lion, that had not flirred in manie yeares, beganne about these times, to roare foloud ypon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Ailus, threatning to make himselfe Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had with. drawne the house of Alerodach, from opposing the Agyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this, the glorie of Agyp: is to fall.

III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to paffe that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to loose that ERODACH the sonne of Baladan, who taking the advantage that sennacheribs misaduenture and death, together with the diffention betweene his children presented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was eleuen yeares troubled with a powerfull Enemie Aarhaddon the fonne of Senacherib, Raigning ouer the Myrians in Nininie; from whom whilest he could not any other way divert his cares, he was faine to omitall bulinesse in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia, fome part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this moleflation, the death of Afarhaddon did not onely fet him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Affria if not (as is commonly but leffe probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How 30 greatly this was to the liking of the Affyrians I wil not here fland to enquire: his long Raigne following, and his little entermedling in matters of Syria make it plaine, that he had worke enough at home, either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Iofephas gives him the honour of having wonne Niniuie it felfe; which we may beleeue; but furely he did not hold it long. For in the times foone following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Atedian. Perhaps it yeelded vpon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylen before it.

Some thinke that this was the Affirian King whole Captaines tooke Alanaffo prisoner; but I rather beleeve those that hold the contrarie; for which I have given 40 my reasons in due place, To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the lewes were his friends, and the Agyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themselues quietat home, which was vutill the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Raigne, or the beginning of his sonne.

Ben Alerodach the sonne and successour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is hee named by good confent of Authours, and that speake little of his doing s. The length of his Raigne is gathered by inference to have beene one and twentic yeares, for somuch remaineth of the time that passed betweene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Raignes (which is a knowne summe) de- 50 ducting the yeares of his Father , and of his sonne Nabulassar This (as I take it) was he that had Manaffes Prisoner and released him. Hee spedillin Syria; where Pfammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercinarie Greekes, did much prevaile. This may haue beene some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his handes some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alleaged before. Nabulassar that Raigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater busines in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: infomuch asit may bee thought to have beene a great negligence or over-fight of Plammitiess and Neco, that they did not occupie some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes inuaded Affria, and befeiged Niniue; from whence he was not repelled by any force of 2 abula flar but constrained to remoue by the comming of Scythians, who in these ages did oto uer-flow those parts of the World, laying hold vpon all, that they could master by ftrong hand. Of these Seythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asa, it is conucnient that I speake in this place; shewing briefly afore hand, how the Atedes, vpon whom they first fell, were builed in the same times with hopes of conquering

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, having by manie victories enlarged his Dominions, conceined at length a faire possibilitie of making himselfe

That Citie (as Herodotim reports it) having beene a Soucraigne Ladie was not Herod. Ib. 1. forfaken of all her dependants; yet remained in fuch case, that of her selfe shee was 20 well enough.

This makes it plaine, that how focuer Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Countrie; yet it found the meanes to fet it selfe at libertie: as after this againe it did, when it had beene regain ned by Nabulaffar his Grand-childe.

Sharpe warre, and the verienoueltie of fuddaine violence, vse to difmay anie State or Countrie, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth even those that are vinwarlike. Niniue had beene the Palace of manie valiant Kings lately Raigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the furie, wherewith either Domelticall tumults betweene the sonnes of Senacherih, or forraigne warre of the Ba-20 bylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the leffe wonderfull, that Phraortes did fpeed soill in his journie against it. He and the most of his Armie perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps he vndervalued their forces, and brought a leffe power than was needfull) It is enough, that we may herein beleeue Herodotus.

Cyanares the sonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre then his Father, wanne as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys, hee sought revenge vponthe Affyrians for the death of his Father, and belieged Niniue it felfe, having a purpose to destroy it. Irather beleeue Evsebivs, that he tooke the Citie and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than HERODOTUS, that the Scythian Armie come upon 40 him whilest he lay before it. For where equal authorities are contradictorie (as Ensebius, though farre later than Herodotus, yet having seene other Authours, that are now loft, is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe I hold it best, to yeeld vnto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Seythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilest hee lay before Ninine, were to accuse him of greater improvidence, than ought to bee suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that hee was faine to leave the Towne, when a warre so dangerous fell vpon his owne Countrie, doth well agree both with the condition of fuch bufineffe as that Soythian expedition brought into thole partes, and with the State of the Chaldean and Affirian affaires ento fuing:

The destruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there fet downe as happening about these times; of which Booke whosoeuer was the Authour, hee was ancient enough to know the Storic of those ages, and hath committed no fuch errour in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophelie of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine rearme, vet it appeares to have taken effect, in the finall destruction of Niniue by Nabuchodonofor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Agypt, foregoing this calamitie, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that afcribe more authoritie than the reformed Churches yeeld, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessitie, to affirme, that about these times Ninine was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victorie ouer it, to Ben Oferodach : a needleffe conjecture, if the place of Enfebrus be well confidered. Yet I holdit probable, that Nabulaffar the fonne of Ben Merodach did feize vponit, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about fuch time as the Countrie of 10 Affiria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian watte ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out readie to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Niniuites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon fo affwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabulaffar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, tooke him and them into protection: though afterwards, to their confusion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as shalbe shewed in the Raigne of Aubucho done for.

ò. IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twentie yeares.

†. I.

The time of this expedition.

OW that I have showed what impediment was given by the Aff- 19 rians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much dif abled to performe any action of worth youn the Agyptians in Spiris it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which onevoully afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in such wife that part of the trouble redounded curn to the Agyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes verie large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with confent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will beeneedlesse to recite them, for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times, which by 40 inference out of his relations, may feeme very strange, needeth some answerein this place; leaft otherwife I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Authour, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or elfe to bee too forgetfull of my felfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which I had alreadic buried. Eight and twentie yeares he faith that the Seythians Raigned in Asia, before Cravares delivered the Countrie from them. Yet hee reports a warre betweene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the fiege of Ninine; the fiege of Ninine being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, hauing vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountred in Palestina by Pfanmiticus King of Agypt, who by giftes and entreatic procured them to de- 50 part from him. These narrations of Herodotte may, every one of them, bee true; though not in such order of time as he hath marshalled them. For Pfammitiens was dead before Cyanares beganne to Raigne: and Cyanares had spent halfe of his fortic yeares, ere Halyattes was King of I ydia; fo that he could not, after those Lydiss warres, Raigne eight and twentie yeares together with the Seythisms. It is true, that Eufebiss doth also call Psissmis the some of Pharao Neco, by the name of Psissmissus, and this King Psissmis may, by some strained conjecture, bee thought to have beene he that met with the Seythisms: for he lined with both Cyascares and Halastims. But Eusebiss himselfe referres all that businesses of the Seythism irruption into Palestima, to Psissmissis the Father of Neco, whom hee leaves dead before the Raigne of thisyates. Therefore I dare not relie upon Herodotse, in this matter, o

I have noted before, that in the Raigne of Ardys King of Lydis, the Cimmerians over-ranne that Kingdome, and were not expelled, untill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardy got the vpper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardys, Sadyattes, and Halyattes, are wee to find the eight and twentic yeares, wherein the Seythians Raigned over Asia. Now forassimuch as Planmittens the Argyptan had some dealolings with the Seythians, cuen in the height of their prosperitie, wee must needes allow more than one or two of his last yeares, vnto this their Dominion. But he below more than one or two of his laft yeares, wnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Raigne in Lydis, being three and twentie yeares complear after the death of Pfammittous, leaues the space verie scant, either for the great victories of the Seythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Seythian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ore they could bee druen quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Raigne of Nabachadons for in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may weethink it possible, that he should have adventured the strength of his Kingdome against the Seythians and towes, had be shood in daily seare of loosing his owne; to a more mighte National South and the strength of his Raigness and the set of the strength of the services as the services are the services as t son, that may be not should be presented to Cyaxares and Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole bodie of their Armie, but were the descatures of some troupes, that inselted their seurall Kingdomes 3 other Princes, and among these, Nabulassian hauing the like succession the people of the manuscript of the corrages of these hardie Northerne Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeares of the Seythians rule, to as manie almost the last of Nabulassian Raigne, in compassion where the time, wherein As suffered the violence of these opporessions.

†. II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their sournic.

Touching the expedition it felfe, Herodotu tels vs, that the Cimmerians being driuen out of their Countrie by the septimus, innaded and wasted some part of Assand that the Septimus not contented with hauing wonne the land of the Cim30 merians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remooned quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Addia and Agpt, in this pursuit of menthat were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Septimus, as mischieuous and soolists or else Herodotus, and some other of his Countriane, great standerers of those, by whom their Nation had beene beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grieuously runfackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is fo well knowne, and their manie Conquetts fo well testified in Histories of diucrfe Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is infulficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posteritie of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World; and whose reflow did ouerwhelme no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before x and after, as in the age whereof we doe now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselfe of their original and actions, may peruse Goropius Becamis his imazonica; of manie things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is faid to have spoken, of all Gorepius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, 10 but hard to confute them: There wee find it proued, by fuch arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Seythans, and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; howfocuer diftinguished in name, by reason of their diuerfe Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed thath mention of the Cimmerians, whose Countrie whether he place in the West, as neare vnto the Ocean and boundes of the Earth, Or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and coucred with eternall darknesse; certaine it is that he would have them neare neighbours to Hell: for hee had the same quarrell to them, which Herocosts had, and therefore belike would have made them seeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirmes) to infertinto 20 his workes the names of fuch as lived in his owne times, making fuch mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deserved. And for this reasonit is proued by Euftathius, that the Cimmerians were fo differed by him, because they had wasted his Countrie. Perhaps, that invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons. whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Prismes his difcourfe with Helen, was the Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amuseus, together inuaded Alia, This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Conmercial (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Afra; which though it bee not in expresse tearmes written, that they did with joynt forces, yet seeing they inua. 32 ded the felfe same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journie of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eulebius, was by the straights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs , that the verie fame, which Eufebius noteth to have happened somewhat before the age of

Le Seythians therein gaue them affiftance. The fame Authour, before his entrieinto Diod, lib. 3.4.11. those discourses of the Amazons; which himselfe acknowledgeth to bee fabulous, doth report them to have beene Wives of the Scythians, and no leffe warlicke than their Husbands; alleadging the example of that Queene, who is faid to have flaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carrie their wives along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those women; the terrible descent of them into Italie, when Atarius the Roman overthrew 40 them, gives proofe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; other place will give mee better leifure to speake of them; but seeing that they are noted by diverse Historians to have belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Serthians, and to the Sarmatians, wee may the better approone Goropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neare allies. Now concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Seythians, it appeares to . have been none other than the fending a Colonic of them forth into Alia, with an Armie of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the

The Sarmatians also were companions in this journie. For the Citic of None- 50 grad in Russia (which Countrie is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was up in Armes : and therefore it is no maruaile though manie Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voiage was that, which the same people made fine hundred yeares and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romens. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Meetis; they were then likewise affilted (faith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their neigh- Plutarch in the bours; they had in their Armie about three hundred thousand fighting men, be- lite of Maries, fides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandered ouer manie Countries, beating all downe before them, and finally, thinking to have fetled themselves in Italie, they divided their companie, for the more case passage thither and were confumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Confuls. Mere necessitie enforced these poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard aducatures. to For their Countrie, being more fruitfull of men than of full enance, and thut vp on

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

30 THE first Companie of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held > the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leaving on the other fide, and behind them, the great Mountaines of Caucalius. These hauing passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Countric of Pontsus, and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie Hered libes. whereon Sinope, a famous Hauen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it feemes that they bestowed the weakest and most vnseruiceable of their traine, together with the heauiest part of their cariages, vnder some good gard: as drawing necreto those Regions, in conquest where cof they were to trie the vtmost hazard. For in like fort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake euen now) dispose of 40 their impediments, leaving them in a place of firength, where Antwerpe now flands, when they drew neere vnto Gaule, vpo which they determined to aduenture themselues in the purchase. From Sinope, the way into Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines or any deepe

Rivers to state their march: for Iris and Halys they had alreadie passed. What battailes were fought betweene these inuaders and the Lyclisis, and with what variable fuccesse the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written, nor amable to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got pofsession of Sardes the Capitall Citie of Lydia; only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tels of the acts performed by G. ges so and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this invalion, and by Halyattes and Crasus in the times following: all that Ardys did against the Cimmerians, and all (faue burning the Milelians Corne fields) that was done in twelue yeares by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands fo full of this businesse, that hee could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted. Hereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did anie thing worthic of remembrance in those warres, but were gladenough that they did not loose all.

Certainly, the miferies of warre are neuer fo bitter and manic, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, for faking their owne feates, labours to roote out thee. stablished possessor another Land, making roome for themselves, their wives and children. They that fight for the masterie are pacified with tribute, or with fome other feruices and acknowledgements, which had they beene yeelded at the first, all had beene quiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants have, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, even to the cradels of the sucking to infants. The mercilesse tearmes of this controuersie arme both sides with desperate resolution : seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or loofe their lines without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe haue felt examples hereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was ouerthrowne by such invalions. But our Isle of Brittaine can best witnesse the diversitie of Conquests; having by the happie victorie of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civile arts, in exchange of libertic, that was but flenderly instructed therein before; whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish warres, was, as were the causes, quite contrarie. For these did not seeke after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Countrie, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible 20 crueltie, eradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memorial of theancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are alfo of the Cimmerian bloud) found fuch end of their enterprise, as it may seemethat the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Scythians in the higher Asia, did arrive vnto. So that by confidering the processe of the one, we shall the better conceine the fortune of the other. Manie battailes the Danes wonne; yet none of fuch importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Manie the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance even of viter enmitie, had bred fuch acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of 30 both these people, made the one more pliant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great flaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Countrie wide enough to receive them, as having diffourthened it felfe of manie thousands, that were sent to seeke their graues abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victoric of Holyattes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde hereunto my further conjecture; which is, that the matter was focom- 40 pounded between the Cimmerians and Halyattes', that the River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne side of the River was the Countrie of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimerians and other Scythian people; whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have beene.

And hercunto the quarrell enfuing, between Hulyattes and Cyaxnes the Mele, hath verie good reference. For Hulyattes (as is faid ) fought in defence of certaine Seythinns, yoon whom the Atelian fought reunge. And it flands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall flaughters, should have joyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common safetie: though o 57 therwise it had beene dangerous to Hulyattes, if he had permitted the Medianto extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, what so ever the pretences might bee, often thing reunge yoon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the warre between these two Kings, which Herolous relates, I find it of little waight, and leffe probabilitie. He tels of Soythians, that being chaled out of their Countrie by faction, came vnto Cyaxares; who committed vnto them certaine Boyes, to bee instructed in the Seythian tongue, and feate of Archerie. Now it so fell out (faith he) that these Scythians ving much to hunt, and commonly bringing home fomewhat with them, did neuertheleffe other whiles miffe of their game, and come home as they went. Hercupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitterly reuiled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was under their charge, whom dreffing like Venison they presented vnto him; which done they fied vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliners, as the ground of a warre that lasted fixe yeares betweene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demmanding these Fugitiues to bee deliuered into his hand, the other refusing to betraie such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians, to betake themselves to either of these Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he shewed in the massacring of their Countrie men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee should speake.

t. IIII.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Afa.

A Sthe Cimmerians held their courfe Westerly, along the shores of the Euxine
A Sea: so the Scythians and Sarmatians tooke the other way, and having the Cafpinn Sea on their left hand, passed betweene it and Caucasus through Albaina, Calthone, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Gengia, and so they entered into Media. The Medica countered them in Armes sob were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to anie agreement with them. This was 30 in the time of Phraptes, while Pfammiticus Raigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixty care of Nabulasus Raigne ower Baylon (supposing him to have Raigned fiue and thirtie, otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twentie yeares of their Dominion end, one yeare before the great Nabusindanoso was King, so giving him good leave to provide securely, for the inuation of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as 10ssphus out of Berosous Teaches.

Now the Medes, desirous to saue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refused not to vindergoe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, and that would ferue to remoove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Seythians finding still the Countries pleasanter and better, the further that they marched into the South, did fuffer themselves to bee perswaded, that a little more trauaile, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied so much your their owne valour, that they feared no relistance; and being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwel in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Agypt, I doe not thinke: Babylon was neare enough; whither if hee could fend these Locusts to graze, than should not his vnsriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his missortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had anie, dealings with them I doe not reade. But it is 50 well knowne, that his Dominions lay in the middest betweene Atedia and Agypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Alia Tributarie; wherefore we may verie well beleeve, that they watered their horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them provender.

tooke care that they might not looke vpon Egypt; least the tight thereof should more eatily detaine them there, than anic force or perfusiion, that hee could vie would fend them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, prefuming more on the great gifts which he ment to bellow vpon them, than on his Armie that should keepe them backe. Agipt was rich; and halte the riches thereof had not beene ill spent in fauing all. Yet Pfammitieus tooke the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had beene so obstinate as to 10 refuse all indifferent composition. For hee lay close vpon the edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palastina: whence hee never advanced to meet with the Seythians; but gaue them leaue to feele as much of the scalding Sun-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as ni all the length of Stria could beat upon them. When they were come as farre as Alcalon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did he affay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to worke fo much the better, by how much the world they were pleafed with the heat of a Climate to farre different from their owne. Pfamminess had at his backe a vait wildernesse, ouer the scorching sands whereof, the Seythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrarie diffempers, could ill haue indured to purfue him, through vnknowne wayes, had they fought with him and prevailed: especially the Kingdome of Agret being readic to entertaine him with relicts, and them with new trouble at the end of their wearie journie. Wherefore they were 20 content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to vilite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (belides that he preserved his owne E state from a dangerous adventure, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him ) found all his cost well repayed in the processe of his wars in Spria, where the Nations beyond Euplirates had no power to moleft him, being more then euer troubled themselues, with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resoluing now to seeke no further, beganne to demaund more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grieuous exactions, they prefumed to line at diferetion upon the Countrie, taking what they lifted from the Owners; and manie times (as it were to faue the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long yfed over the higher Aia, that is, ouer the Countrie lying betweene the Caspian and Red Seas, and betweene India and Afia the leffe. Happie it was for the poore people, that in fo large a space of ground, there was roome enough for these new comers; otherwife the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those private men, to whose wealth anie Seythian did beare a fancie, would have lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leauing few aline, and none able to relieue their fellowes. Yet it feemes that the heaviest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrie, not farre from their owne home, and lay vnder a Climate well agreeing with the conflitution of their bodies: there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their 49 infolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyanares King of the Medes, who in this extremitie was no betterthen a Rentgatherer for the Scythians, perceiuing that his Land lay vnmanured and walle, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions; and that the matter could not be remedied by open force; refolued to proue what might be done by stratagem. The managing of the businesse is thus delivered in briefe: That he, and his Wedes, feasted the better part of the Scythians; made them drunke; and flew them; recourring hereby the possession of all that they had

Such another flaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was re- 59 uenged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelties than euer they had practifed before. That the Scythians, which escaped this bloudie scaft, made any stirre in Media, I doe not find; neither doe I read that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inuation from Septhia in time following.

This is the more itrange, for that the Armie returning home out of Mediawas verie firong, and encountred with opposition (as Herodorus reports it) no leffe then it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyrares to free his Countrie, tooke good effect, with leffe bloud-shed than hath beene supposed. For if hee surprised all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compolition. Manie of them doubtleffe, in eight and twentie yeares, had so well setled themselues, that they were desirous of relt, and might be permitted, without anie danger, to remaine in the Countries manie (of whom I shall speake anon) shaning done what they could in the bufineffe, for which they came forth, were willing to returne home, with what they had gotten; fuch as were not pleafed with either of tixle two courses, might goe joyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other prouinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are faid to have beene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be underflood, that a great part of the Seythians, vpon hope of gaine, or delire to keepe what they had alreadie gained, were content to become subject vnto Nabulassar: mens lone of their wealth being most effectuall, in taming the more viquiet loue of inordinate libertie. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnez zar, as euer after, fo in his first beginning 10.259 of warre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing, had beene accultomed, to deale with the Babylonians after another fallion : and this new fuccesse of that 20 King may be imputed, in regard of humane meanes, to fuch addition as this of new

Of the Seythian Armic returning out of Media, diverse Authours report a Storic, which confirmes mee in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to affifttheir kindred and friends, in acquiring a new feate, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wives behinde them; a good argument to prove that they meant to come againe. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellowes to their slaves. These got a lustie brood of youths, that were loath to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were only the children of flaues, 30 which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would have it, who tels vs, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their Bond-mens eies) it must needs be that they were verie Boyes, or else that the Women did verie little while continue chaft. Wherefore I rather believe the tale as it is told by the Ruffes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Anceftors returning homewards, which I will fet downe, as I find it, in Mr. Doctor Fletever his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They understood by the way that Kustemmon. their Cholopey, or Bonel-flaues whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their. 49.4. Townes, Lands, Houses, Wives, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet difdayning the Vilianie of their feruants, they made the more speed home : and fo not farre T

40 from Nonograd, met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon admfing . what was helt to bee done, they agreed all to fet upon them with no other thew of weapon but with their hor fe-whips (which as their manner is every manrideth with all) to put them in remembrance of their feruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And fo marching on, and lashing altogether with their whips in ther hands, they gane the onfet. Which feemed fo terrible in the eares of their Villaines , and firoke fuch a yenfe into them of the fmart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheef chefore the Driners. In memorie of this victorie, the Nouogradians ener fince bane Hamped their Coine (which they call a Dingoe Nouverodskoy currant through all Ruffie with the figure of a Horseman Shaking a whip a loft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the 30 women of that Countrie, have fared the worse ever since, in regard of this wiverfall fault : for fuch a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those flaues, curioufly wronght by her selfe, is the first present that the Moscouisn Wife, even in time of wooling lends to him that shalbe her husband, in token of subjection; being well affured, to feele it often on her own loines. But this was a Document vnto the Beythians, or rather

Sarmatians, (for Nonograd stands in the Countrie that was called Sarmatia) to beware of abfenting themselues anie more so long from their Wines; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to fet downe of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to manie Countries; but for that it appeares to have beene a great cause, of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Indea, which to continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

Of Princes lining in diverfe Countries, in thefe ages.

Auing thus farre digressed from the maters of Inda, to avoide all further occasion of doing the like, I wil here inserte a note of such Kines and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manalies, and the ruine of Ieru/alem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Meses, and Lydians, I have spoken as much, as I thought needfull. In Kome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and and twentierh yeare of Infias; at 20 which time Ancus Martius succeeding Raigned Foure and twentie yeares, After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but verie rich, preuaised so far by his gracious fieste among the people, that he got the Kingdome to himselfe, disapointing the fonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He beganne in the fourth yeare of Zedekia, and Raigned eight and thirtie yeares. In this time it was namely in the fecond yeare of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedamonians, bethinking them how to bee avenged of the Arcadians, who gave fuccour to the Meffenians against them in the former warre, entred the Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cypfelius expelling the race of the Bacida made himfelfe Lord of Carinihabout these times, and gouerned it in peace thirtie yeares; leaving for successour his some Periander, one of the scuen Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile als. flew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corintian women starke naked, burning their apparrell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive that the wiscdome of the Greekes, was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Coun-

In these times also were Zaleness, and Draco, famous Lawginers, the one among the Locrians in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Erace were fo rigorous, that he was faid to have written them with bloud: for hee rewarded eue- 10 rie small offence with death. Wherefore his constitutions were soone abrogated, and power given to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were verie milde. He forbad anie Gentlewoman to walke abread with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unleffe it were when thee was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnlefle it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse herselse vp in immodest brauerie, vnlesse it were to inueigle a louer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his defire : for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a fingular example of juffice, that when his owne fonne had committed adulteric, and was therefore to look both his eyes, he did not cause him 52 to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to faue the yong man (who alfoloft one) from vtter blindnesse.

I shall not henceforth need, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often bane done, in pursuing of actions collaterall to the Historic, for inferting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soone fall under the Persians; the Persians, ere long, encounter with the Greekes; the Greekes, with the Romans; the Romans, with manie Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estatesit will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirteene hundred yeares, which paffed betweene the calling of Abra m, and the destruction on of Ierufalem, we finde little matter, wherein the Hittorie of Ifrael had anie dealine with otheir Nations, than the verience arett borderers. Yet reade we of manie Kingdomes, that in these manie ages, were credied, and throwne downe; as liketo wife, manie memorable acts were performed in Greece and elfewhere, though not following one another at anie neare distance; all which must have beene quite omitted, or elfe referued vnto a verievnfeafonable rehearfail, had they not beene difpoled in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conueniencie, may pardon

The oppression of Indea, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldeans.

OW to returne to the Iemifb Storie, from whence wee have so farre digreffed. In the third years of Ichoiakim, Nabuchodonofor the fecond, his Father yet liuing, entred Iudaa with a great Armie, who befeiging and forcing Ierufalem, made Ieboiakim his Vasfall in despight of Neco, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Milael, and Azarias. Also he tooke a part of the Church treasures; but staied not to fearch them throughly; for Aecho 30 hafted to the fuccour of Ichoiskim, hoping to finde Nabuchodenefor in Indea: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Armie, it being a Countric of an cuill affection towards him, as also farre on from any succour or sure place of retrait. If he had, as may be supposed, ande erea, twenoth of Southian horsemeninhis Armie; it was the more wifely cone of him, to tall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Countrie, into places that were more euen and temperate. But belides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the fame time, gave him infl occasion to returne home; and take possession of his owne Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the fecond care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leasure: for the Egyptian was not readic to follow him to farre and to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeare came in; which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Neco. In this yeare the Babylonian lying upon the Banke of Euphrates (his owne Territoric bounding it on the North-fide) attended the arrivall of Necho. There, after a resolved contention for victorie, Necho was flaine, and his Armie remayning forced to faue it felfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victorie Nabuchadonofor fa well purfued, as he recourred all Syria, and what focuer the Egyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Agyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the prefent discouraged, tehaiakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Agyptian, yet having made his peace with the Chaldean the yeare 50 before; who contented with such profit as hee could then readily make, had forborne to laie anie Tribute vpon Inda. But this coole referuednesse of Iehoiakim, was on both fides, taken in ill part. The Agyptian King Pfammis, who fuccees ded vnto Necho, beganne to thinke vpon restoring Iehoshiz, taken Prisoner by his tather, and fetting him vp, as a Domestical Enemie, against his vngratefull brother.

Againitall luch accidents, the Judiesn had prepared the viuall remedie, practifed by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne fonne Iechonia King with him long be-fore, in the second yeare of his owne Raigne, when the Boy was but Eight yeares olde. As for this rumour of Ichoahan his returne; the Prophet Ieremie fortold, that it thould proue idle, faying : he shall not returne thither, but hee shall die in the place whither they haveled him captine, and shall fee this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having foent all their Mercinarie forces, and received that heavie blow at Carchemilb, had not remayning fuch proportion of sharpe steele, as of faire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Neco was not in Planmis, A. pries who Raigned after Pfammis, did once aduenture to flew his face in Spria; but to after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with braue words, teiling fuch friuolous tales, as men, that meane to doe nothing, vie, of their glorious acts ionepaffed, against Iosias and Iehoahaz. In this case it was calle for Ieholakim to give them fatisfaction, by letting them understand, the sinceritie of his affection towardes them; which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonofor went to worke more roundly. He fent a peremptoric meffage to lehoiakim, willing him not to fland upon any nice points, but acknowledge himfelfea Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hereunto fuch fearefull threats, as made the poore Indaan lay atide all thought of Josph Anti, lib. Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mightic would have him. So he continued 20 in the obedience of Nabuchodonofor three yeares. At this time Ieremie the Prophet cried out against the series, putting them in mind that he had now three and twentie yeares exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their cares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captinitiest hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seuentic yeares. The same calamitic hee threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Agyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drinke out of the Babylanian Pitcher, the wine of His furie, whom they had forfaken, and after the feuentic yeares expired, that the Babylonians themselves should talk of the fame cup, and be veterly subnerted by the Medes, & the Indeans, permitted to return 20 againe into their owne fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet teremie seemes to have beene in the fourth yeare of this lehoiakim, at which time Ba-

Barueh to hide themselves. Iehoiakim after he heard a part of it and perceived the ill newes therein delivered, made no more adoe but did cut the Booke in peices and cast it into the fire. All which Ieremie caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead bodie of sehoiskim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and that there should bee none of his seede to sit on the Throne of David.

ruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom hee tent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King:

but fearing the Kings furie they had first set Ieremie at libertie, and aduised him and

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributarie to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Leyptian; the mightie Citie of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; and vpon just confidence of her owne Arength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now for asmuch as the terme of feuentic yeares, was prescribed vnto the desolation, as well of Tire, as of Ierusalem, and other Townes and Countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeare of Nabucheauno. for, have fure authoritic for their warrant. Whereupon likewife it followes of necessitie, that the siege thereof beganne in the seventh of his Raigne; as having 50 lasted thirteene yeares.

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note, concerning the feuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath rifen much disputation. The third yeare of Jehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being CHAP.28. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

deliuered from other cares, tooke notice of fuch as had revolted from him vnto Pharao Neco, and fent this Noble Prince, his fonne, with an Armie into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes posterior mention of the same yeare. The yeare next following, being the fourth of 1ehoia- 10 ton, 25. 1. kim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Ieremie affirmeth in expresse wordes; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeare he conquered £gypt; and then beganne to R aigne as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offena him. The second from this yeare it was, wherein he faw that vision, of the Image consisting of fundrie Mettals; which did prefigurate the fuccession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the com-ming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which beganne in the feuenth of his Raigne.

The Citie of Tyre couered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the maine, by a deep & broad channel of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vie them, excelled all other Nations; and euerie Winde, from one part or other, brought needfull prouisions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuerthelesse the indgements of God (denounced against it by Esty 2; 20 E/ay, leremie, Ezechiel,) had threatned the destruction; and the obstinate resolution 1000 25 of Nabuchodonofor, had fully determined to performe it. This high minded King, Exters. impatient of relistance, vndertooke a vast piece of worke; euen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The Citic of olde Tyrus, that stood op-politero the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountaine of Libanus neare adjoyning that was loaden with Cedars, and aboundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteene yeares were spent, in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Aexander working vpon that foundation which was remayning of Nabuchodonofers Pecre; and being withall affilled by a strong Fleet, was yet seuen months ere hee could 30 make way into the Citie. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carrie away that wherewith Alexander laboured to couer a shelue; with much more violence could it ouerturne, and as it were confume, the worke of Nabuchedonofor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe; striuing as it were, to fill the emptic bellie of this Cormorant, whereas the Micedonian, did only ftop the throat of it. Euerie manknowes, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his ownethreats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vie, either miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the faucurable concurrence of all second helpes. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastiling the pride of man, to 40 viethe hand of man; even the hand of man striving, as may sceme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans Everie head was made bald, and eneric shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonoser would not Free 19. giue ouer till he was master of the Towne.

When he was entred vpon this desperate service, whether it were so, that some lossesceined, some mutinie in his Armie, or (which is most likely; and so Iofephut reports it) some glorious rumours of the Agyptians, gaue courage to his euill willers, Ieloiakim renounced his Subjection, and beganneto hope for the contrarie of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodono or gaue him no leifure to doe much hurt but with part of his Armie marched directly into Iudea; where the amazed 50 King made so little resistance (the Ægyptians having lest him, as it were in a dreame) that he entred Ierusalem, and laied hands on Iehniakim: whom hee first bound and determined to fend to Babylon, but changing counsell, he caused him to bee slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to be denoured by beasts and ra- * uenous birds, according to the former Prophecies leaving in his place, Ichoiakim or Iera 7.

Icchonius his fonne; whom after three moneths and tenne dayes Nabuchoconofor removed and fent Prisoner to Babylon , with Ezekiel, Mardochaus , and Infedech, the high Priest. The mother of Iechonias, together with his feruants, Eunuches, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carried away Captines. This Iechonias, following the counsell of Ieremie the Prophet, made no refiftance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein hee both pleased God, and did that which was beit for himfelfe; though at the prefent it might feemeo. therwife, to such as considered the cuill that befell him, rather then the greater cuill that he thereby anoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it feemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an initigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate; for so we reade in generall wordes, that he did evillin the falt of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his flead Nabuchodonoforeliablished Mathaniahis Vnclein the Kingdome of Juda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to fay, as the Institute of God. For like as Nece, King of Agypt, had formerly displaced telegahaz, after his Father lostias was flaine, and fet vp Ichoiskim the forme of another Mother; fo Nabuchodonofor flew Ichoiakim who depended on the Aexptians, and carrying his fonne Iechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Ichoshaz, whom Accotooke with him into Agypt.. From Zedechias hee required an oath for his faithfull obe-23 dien ce, which Zedechius gaue him, and called the living God to witnesse in the same, that he would remaine affured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first yeare of Zedechias, Ieremie faw and expounded the Vision of theripe and rotten Grapes the one fignifying those Indeans that were carried away captine, the other those that staird, and were destroied.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremie wrote in a Booke all the cuill that should fall vpon Babylon, which Book or scrole he gaue to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechras to Babylon, to visite Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to reade it to the Captine Ieres, and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words. Thus fhall Babel be drowned, and fhall not rife from the cuill that I will bring upon to ber. This journie of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have beene in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Mcssengers to him, inciting him (as it feemes) to those viquiet courses, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he wore about his owne necke, others hee fent vnto the flue Kings of Edom, Month, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visite Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Inda abode in the obedience should affuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence. Hee also foretolde them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Ierusa lem, should also trausile after the rest, and at length they should bee restoreda-

of Babylon, they should then possessed and enjoy their owne Countries; if not, they 40

The same yeare Ananias, the salse Prophet, tooke off the wooden Chaine which Ieremie ware, in figne of the Captiuitie of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeares, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Jechonias, and all the Jewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Icremie in stead of his wooden Yoke ware a Coller of yron : and in figne that Anamas had 50 giuen a deceitfull and false hope to the people, hee foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second moneth. After this, when Zedechian had wavered long enough betweene faith and passion, in the eight yeare of his Raigne he practifed more feriously against Nabuchodonofor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Anmonites, Mabites, Tyrians, and others that were promifed great aides of the Agyptians : in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian Yoake. Hereof when Nabuchodonofor had knowledge, hee marched with his Armie in the dead of Winter, toward Ierufalem, and belieged it. Ieremie perswaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himselfe: but being consident of the helpe from Agypt and being perswaded by his Counseilors, and talse Prophets, that it was vnpossible that the Kingdome of Inda should bee extirpate, vntill the comming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Iscob) hee despised the wordes of Graggie, Ieremie and imprisoned him. For Ieremie had told the King, that the Citie should be to taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but bee taken Prisoner, and 10.32.634 brought to the presence of Nabuchodonofor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death. Jerufalem being, the following yeare, furrounded by Nabucho denofors Armic; the tenfacion Denig, the conormag years, an observate (teredesia callect him Aprice) Janua.

King of Egypt, Phasa Hophia according to teremie (teredesia callect him Aprice) Janua. entred the border of Inda, with his Armie, to fuccour Zedechias, of whofereuolt he had beene the principall Author. But Ieremie gaue the Iewes faithfuil counfell, willing them not to have anie trust in the succours of Agypt : for hee assured them.

that they should returne againe, and in no sort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Charleans removed from Jerufalem to encounter the Agyp-20 tians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward returned into Egypt, as if they had alreadie done enough; leaving the poore people of Ierufalem to their destined miseries.

In the meane while the Ierres, who, in their first extremitie, had manumised their Hebrew Bondmen (as Gods Law required at the yeare of Iubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of the Chaldean Armie, repent them of their Charitie: and thinking all had beene at an end, held them perforce to their former flauerie. But the Chaldees being retur- 10.34. nedto the liege, the Prophet Ieremie, when the State of Ierufalem beganne now to grow to extremitie, counselled Zedechias to render himselfe vinco them; affering 10.39. 20 him of his owne life, and the faferic of the Citie, if he would so doe. But his obfinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and perjurie, had prouided for him.

eighteene; the Babylonian Armie lay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding streightly belieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) ex- 2. King 25.1. truxerunt contra cam turrem ligneam per circuitum, they surrounded the Citie with wooden Towers, fo as the belieged could neither fally out, nor receive into the Citie any supply of men or victuals. Iosephus reports, that they over-topped the Wals, 10seph. Ant. Ind. with high Towers raifed upon mounts; from which they did fo beat upon the bisecopate 4) Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to forfake their stations. Now although it were so that the belieged also raised Counterbuildings, like vnto these, Yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found meanes to overthrow all the Citizens endenours; and to beat downe as fast from without, as they raised from within; the bodie and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Wals of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within, laied open to their enemies disturbance. Befides, both famine and peffilence (which commonly accompanie men fireightly belieged) grew on fall vpon them, whereby, when the number, firength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entric, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable fight, and finding no remedie of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himselfe together with his Wines, Children, Princes, and principall fernants, out of the Citic, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed and guidleffe people, to the merciles fwords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when teremie the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the Counsell of God and the force of Nabucho done for: vied now that remedie, which Wo phiss truly termeth : triste, turpe, & infelix, wefull, Shamefull, and vnfortunate.

By this fecret fubterrane vault, Zedechi, 15 making his flealth, recoursed (by the helpe of the darkenight) the plaines or deferts of Iericho: but by reason of the traine, the t followed him and his, (cueric one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) hee was easily traced and pursued. How great socuer the companie was that attended on him, yet, as loferbus reports it, they on whole fidelitie he most reposed himselfe, no sooner beheld the Chaldeans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Defarts as they to could. For whom God had forfaken, no man followed, but the Minifiers of his vengeance; by whom Zealechius being made Prifoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conneighed to Reblu or Reblath a Citie (as forme thinke) of Achtalim. where Nabucho dono for then laie, as a place indifferent betweene Ierufalen and Tire. with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodonofor had laied before Zedekias the manie graces and benefits conferred vpon him, together with the notable falleshood and perjurie wherewith he had requited them, he commaunded his Children, Princes, and Friends to be flaine before his face. This being done, to the end that fo lamentable a spectacle should be the last, that cuer hee should be hold in the World, hee caused his eyesto 10 be torne out of his head, and so carried him in a flauish manner to Babel, where hee confumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most marueilous Prophecie of Ezechiel was performed; Adaucem eum in Babrlonem & splam non videbit. I willbring him into Babylon and he shall not feeit. Thus in the Eleuenth and last yeare of Zedekias which was the eighteenthof Nabuchodonofor, the Chaldens entred the Citie by force, where sparing no lexnor age, they committed all to the fword that they therein found.

In the yeare next following, Nabazaradan, General of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Ierusalem: and after this fire had insted from the scuenthto the tenth day, he aife burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had flood 30

commanded seauentic and two others to bee slaughtered, which had hidden themfelues from the fielt furie, to wit, the chiefe and the fecond Prieft, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, fine of his House-should-servants, and othersto that number; carrying away to Babylon the ableft of the people throughout all indas, and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the partie of Nabuchadonofor, to till the ground : ouer whom he left Gouernour, Godolis the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iofics had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equitic, by lofephus highly commended. This 40 man, a Iew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the warre: and by Icremies defire to line with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfealtogether to the Bahylonian, who being ordained by God to exercise his justice, was therefore reliftlesse. The Prophet Ieremie being lest to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldea, or elsewhere, he made election of Goe'oliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Ieremie, but gaue comfort to all the other Iewes that were left under his charge, promifing them fauour and libertie, fo long as they remained obedient Subjects to Nabuchodonofor, by whom hee was established 50 Prouincial! Gouernour of his owne Nation.

But ere that yeare was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the fiege of Ierusalem, had kept himselfe out of the storme, with Baalis King of the Ammonites) being followed by tenne other chosen men, while Godoliah feasted them in Malpha or Minspa, the Citie of his relidence, traiteroully flew him, together with diners Chaldeans and terres that accompanied him. This done, hee made an escape, and in his way encountring with eightic persons, repairing towards Godoliab with presents, he slew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discouer vnto him some Treasures, hidden in the siedes during the warre. He also tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechius, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuckodonofor. This practife and intent of Ifmael had beene formerly discouered vnto Godolia by Johanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jewes; but Godoliah Index being now left without a Gouernour (for ifmed durft not take it vpon him, but retired himselfe, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the relidue of the Ieres, fearing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, refolued to flie away into Agypt, and befought Ieremie to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answere, that if they remained in Indea, God would provide for them and shew them mercie, but if they fought to faue themselves in Agypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this aduice, the Iewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining teremie: nd Baruch to accompanie them, they travailed into Agypi, and inhabited by the permifsion of Pharao, necre vnto Taphnes: where, when Ieremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the destruction of themfelues, and the Egyptims also, he was by these his own hardharted and vngratefull Countrimen, floned to death; and by the Egyptians, who creatly reueren. ced him , buried note the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the destruction of Ierusalem to the time of PHILIP of Macedon.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betweene the destruction of ferusalem, and the fall of the Assirtant Empire.

Of the connexion of facred and prophane Historie.

HE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather bee discerned through the greateft part of his way, hitherto paffed in fome out-worne foot-fleps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eatlerne Countries by the accompt from Adabans[far, left furer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; beginsal ength in the ruine of Hierufalem to discourt the connexion of antiquitie for spent and the original land progresse of things could il bee sought in those that we original land progresse of things could il bee sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation; as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp are not to be found among those, that have now no state nor A a a a policie policie remaining of their owne. Having therefore purfued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of fucceeding accidents is with little interruption or tabulous discourse derived vnto vs, I hold it now convenient briefly to shew, by what meanes and circumstances the historie of the Hebrenes. which of all other is the most ancient, may bee conjoyined with the following times, wherein that Image of fundric mettalls, discovered by God vnto 20 alicchadnezzar, did raigne ouer the earth, when I/rael was either none, or an vnregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to infift upon those authorities, which give, as it were by heare-fay, a certaine yeare of fome old Afgrian King vnto fome action or 10 euent, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all fuch computations were blotted out; the fuccession of Belochus and his iffue that occupied that Kingdome afterwards, depending upon the uncertaine relations of fuch, as were neither conflant in affigning the yeares of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relievppon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmonic, which some have found in the yeares of those over-worne Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwife might have beene forgotten. Now concerning the later Kines of that Nation, how focuer it be true that we finde the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could wee only 20 learne in what age each of them lived, but not in what yeare his raigne beganne or ended, were it not that the raigne of Nabuchadnezzar is more precifely applied to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence have we the first light whereby to discouer the meanes of connecting the facred and prophane histories. For vnder Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captivitie of Iuda, which ended when 70. Tyeares were expired; and these 70. yeares tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne affords vs meanes of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeare of cyrus his raigne in Persia, by generall consent, is is owned with the first yeare of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he raigned three and twentie yeares before his Monarchie, and seuen yeares af- 30 terwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controuersie. Giving therefore foure hundred and eight yeares vnto the distance betweene the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; wee may eafily arrive vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in fundrie parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and in-

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to fet downe. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captiuitie are the 40 markes whereby wee are chiefly directed, in paffing from the first vinto the latest yeares of the world, through any storie, with least interruption, it is very expedient that we take some paines to informe our selues truly of the 70. yeares, during which it continued, eucn from Nabuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

d. I I. 50

A brieferchearfall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captivitie: with an answere to the cauills of PORPHYRIE, inueighing against S.MATTHEW. and DANIEL, upon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

Any Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers finde. that the captiuitie then beganne when Jechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleven yeare before the finall destruction of Jerusalem vnder Zedekias. This they proue out of divers places in Ezekiel, espe- exeches. va.

cially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine diftin- 6.3.0.11.0-15. ction betweene the beginning of the captiuitie, and vtter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabuzaradan, in these wordes. In the flue and twentieth yeare of our being in captivitie in the beginning of the yeare, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the fourteenth yeare after that the Citie was (mitten. In which wordes hee beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, cleuen yeares before the Citie was destroied. Beroaldus is of opinion that it beganne in the first of Nabuchodonofor, and the fourth of Joakim, which hee ende-20 nours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of S. Matthew, and Daniel, whose wordes afford matter of long disputation, but serue not to make good fo much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, have ministred occasion of scotting and railing at the Chrifian religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not understanding how the fonnes of King Iofias were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath thewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the fonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyric doth spend the twelfth of his malitious bookes written against the Christians, 20 affirming that these prophecies and visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neare the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond suppolition of his, Eufebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the feuentic Interpreters who connected the old Testament about an hundred yeare before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greeke, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers yeares Mac, 1, 11. before Intiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Ierusalem to have destroied it, this booke of Da- Josep, ant. 11. niel, wherein he beheld his owne gloric foretold, as the fame was plainely expoun-

40 ded vnto him, which not only staied his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his affurance and refolution was so confirmed and strengthned thereby, as despiling all future perill and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one Citie, to wit, Tyre in

It is true indeede that the Iewes themselves give lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moles, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they fay E/dras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the booke of Daniel (I meane fo much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonicall: fecondly, that it 50 was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by Esdras and the Seniors; we may assure our selucs by teitimonic of Councells, and Fathers. For in the Councell of Landican held about the yeare of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and fortie yeares, this booke of Daniel was re-ceiued, verified, and confirmed among the other Canonicall Scriptures, as in the Epitomie of the same Councell it may be seene, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesse Eusebius in his Ecclesiasticall historie, the fourth booke, and fine and twentieth chapter, fo doth the fame Author in the Catalogue of Canonicall bookes upon Origen, fo doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Pfalmes. and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde S. Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographe bookes or holy Writings the Iewes and Rabbines reckon to be thefe, Daniel, Pfalmes, Prouerbs, Joh Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclefiastes, Hefter, Efra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Efdras, that wrote this booke, Gods commandement vnto him by his Angell, to feale vp the fame to the time appointed, is an vnanswerable testimonie. Yea that which exceedethall strength of other proofe, our

Further, in the fift of Iolin, Christ distributeth the rifen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth. verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels visions.

That the 70. yeares of captivitie are to be numbred from the destruction of Ierusalem; not from the migration of IECHONIA.

Auing thus farre digreffed, in maintaining that authoritie, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now convenient, that we returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeares. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakenesse of that which Enselin 20 and some few namelesse Authors, hauc sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into confideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have so earnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Foure Kings of Iuda were carried away captines to Babylon : First, Manasses; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Jechonias, and with him Ezekiel: lastly, Zedekias, at which time the Citie and Temple were destroied. To the first of these captiuities the beginning of the 70. yeares is referred by none that I have read; to the fecond by few and with weake proofe; to the third by very many and with much confidence. For befides those places of Ezekiel al- 40 readie cited, there is a ftrong argument gathered out of Ieremie, which may feeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with lechonies, vieth these words. Thus faith the Lord : After 70. yeares be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeede with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophecie out of circumstances, when the prophecie is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremie had alreadie, in the fourth yeare of Iehoiakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impositioncie of that obstinate people, in these wordes. Behold, I will fend and take to me all the families of 50 the North, faith the Lord, and Nabuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my feruant, and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continual desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the voice of gladnesse, the voice of the Bridegroome, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the mill-stones, and the light of the canale, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and thefe Nations shall serve the King of Babel 70. yeares. And when 70. yeares are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here wee fee prescribed vnto the captivitie the terme of 70. yeares, which were to commence, neither when the prophecie was vittered; nor when Iehoiakim, who then raigned, was taken by Nebughadnezzar; nor yet in the time of Iechonia; but with the vtter desolation of the Citie, whereof Ieremie did againe giue notice to those that were alreadic in Babylon, at such time 10 ashe sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophecie, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeares at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appeares in the end of the Historic of Inda, where it is faid thus. They burnt the houle of God, and Icena, 2, v.16. brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the pre- 17. 6 18. tious veffells thereof to defiroy all: And they that were left by the fivord, carried he away to 2. chron. 26, 10.

Babel, and they were feruants to him and to his fonnes, untill the Kingdome of the Perfians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of IEREMIA, untill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the daies that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. yeares. But in the first yeare of CYRVS King of Persia (when the word of the Lord, 20 Iboken by the mouth of IEREMIA, was finished) the Lord Stirred up the Spirit of CYRVS. Wee seldome find one peece of Scripture so precisely and plainely expounded by another, as in this Prophecie, to have afterwards beene the Subject of altercation. For one can hardly deuise, how either the desolation could have beene expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the euent of the prophecie haue beene more exactly set downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it bee requisite that we bring more proofe in so euident a case, the ninth chapter of Daniel yeeldstestimonie sufficient, vnto this exposition of Ieremia his prophecie, that Ie-rulalem was to lie wast 70. yeares. For in the first yeare of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had been 30 promised by praier, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired : as he telleth vs in these wordes. In the first yeare of his raigne, I DANIEL UN- Dansa. derstood by bookes the number of the yeares, whereof the Lord bad spoken unto IERE-MIAH the Prophet, that hee would accomplish 70. yeares in the desolation of Ierusalem. So that how socuer the time of Daniel his owne captiuitie bee reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeares of their owne captinitie; yet with the generall desolation of the Countrie, wherein were few or none of the Ifraelites left remaining to inhabite, beganne in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonofor the great captivitie, which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of 70. yeares. This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authoritie of Iosephus and others affirming the same; for as much as that which alreadie hath beene produced, is enough to fatisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

Sundrie opinions of the Kings which raigned in Babylon during the 70. yeares.

Hat Kings raigned in Babylon, during these 70. yeares of the captiuitie, and how long each of them did weare the Lindau. and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their raignes, any way helpfull to the concordance of times, fore-going or fuccee. to xoughba. Cyte ding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part pad. lib.).

of it) Hyrexnia Raifria and perhams of tone cases. of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seeme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to case, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honor of his Majettie, where it may feeme that he and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behauiour of the Afgrian Souldiers, in such skirmilhes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no leffe. For whereas under Nebu. chainezzar, they were fo flout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie peece of worke, of winning the strong Citicof 20 Tree, by joyning it vnto the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channell of the Sea, dividing it from the maine with a mole, or peere of earth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approch nearer to the enemie than their bowes would carrie, but were readie to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions, from the end of Nebuchadnezzars warres, till the ruine of paglib.1.6 1/3. their Empire, were not worthie to bee recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and raigne of their feuerall Kings, vnworthie of the great labour that hath 30 in vaine beene taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captinitie of Iuda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeares, we may as reasonably forbeare to fearch into the particular continuance of two or three flouthfull Kings, as wee are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children, liuing in the Levotian serviced; resting satisfied in both with the general affured summe.

Yet for as much as many have travailed in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. yeares, not only by the raignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Asyrians themselues: I will not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kinges themselues, and in setting downe the yeares of their seuerall raignes. The first (as I take it) the furest, is theirs, who meerely follow the authoritie of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name only three Kinges, Nabuchadnezzar, Euilmerodach, and Bulthafar. Neither have they only the lilence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophecie of Ieremie precifely, and in a manner purpofely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, the wing that he being absolute Lord of all would dispose of all, according to his owne will, and making it knowne that he had some Countries here named, into the handes of the King of Babel, faith thus: And all Nations 50 Mall ferue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, untill the very time of his Land come alfo; then many Nations and great Kinges shall serve themselves of him. These wordes expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any diffinction. But indeede I finde no other necessitie of qualification to be vsed herein than such as may grow out of mens delire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this defire were not vniust, if the confent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other fide.

CHAP.I. $.4.

But contrarywife, the Authors which are cited in this cafe, are fo repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are fo flender and vnfufficient, that the fuccession of these Princes, had it not bin thus delivered in Scriptures, but onely fet downe by some Author of equall credite with the rest, might verie well have found and descrued as good beliefe, as anic of those things which they Insertid. to have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Infephrus, derive 110.10.1.0.1.1.1.

that Empire, as by descent from father to sonne, through fine generations; beginning with Nabuchodonofor the great, and giving to him 43. yeres, to Enilmerodach 18, to Niglifar the son of Euilmerodach 40, to Labofardach the sonne of Niglifar 9. moneths, and lastly to Balthafar ( whom Infephius intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonofor, without naming his father) 17. yeares. And this opinion (faue that he forbeares to reckon the yeares, and plainely calles Balthafar the fonne of Labo-(ardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berofus, and Iofephus as a fectator of Berofus for his Authors; though Berofus, as he is cited by Iofephus, report the matter farre otherwise. For he tells vs that Enilmerodach the sonne of Nabuchodono for did 10 contr Ap-20 raigne but 2 yeares, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband pian. Lib. 1. Niziglifforoor, who occupied the kingdome after him 4 yeares, and left it to his owne some Labolardach, who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of moneths flaine by fuch as were about him, and the kingdome given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeares. This relation ill agrees with that of Iofephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number eyther of yeares, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured vnto them fome authoritie, fo that the names which they have inferted, are taken as it were vpon truft. There is a third opinion, which makes the three last kings brethren, and sonnes of Euilme-

30 rodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleeue Xenophon, who faith that the last king of Babylon was immediate successiour Xenoph. Crroped; to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall Historie, who is foun-libr.4. der of this opinion, placeth betweene him that took Ierusalem, and Euilmerodach, another Nabuchodono for : plaine it is that he hath, out of any Historie facred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebius, Sulpitius, Seucrus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue supposed, that Euilmerodach and Balthafar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchadonofor. This is built on the fift chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthafar (for of Euilmerodach there is none that euer doubted) is often called Nabuchodonofor his fonne. And so common grew 40 this explication, that Saint Hierome called it the vulgaropinion. But the place of Icremy before cited, prooues that Balthafar was not the fonne indeede, but the grandchild of that great conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Easterne languages, he was called the sonne.

Annius his Metasthenes hits very rightly the 70 yeres of captivity, giving to Nabuchodonofor 45 yeares, to Euilmerodach 30 yeares, and to the three fonnes of Euilmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonofor 14 yeares; that is, to Reg-Affar the eldeft fonne three yeares, to Lab-Affar Dach the second sonne six yeares, and to Balthafar the third fonne five.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of 50 yeares, and in the number of generations, I have fometime subscribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not fatisfie my felfe herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few fuch of the moderne Writers as deserue to be regarded, have consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar to fucceede vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Aenophon, whose Historie of the elder Cyrus in his Affyrian warre I can nor flightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feaft.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscuritie, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthafar, by Dan.cha.8. verse Annius his Metafthenes, was farre thort of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70 yeares hee pleased among the rest. For in the third yeare of Balthafar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was sicke certaine dayes, but when hee rose vp he did the kings businesse: from 10 which businesse, that hee did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and line retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainely, both by the many words which the old Queene vsed to set out his sufficiencie, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of fuch account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeares have beene worne out of remembrance, were in my judgement a very strange conceipt, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole Dan,2,49.

storie (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures. Out of these reports of Iosephus, Berofus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by coniectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captivitie being 70 20 yeares, and these yeares extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his sonne and grand-child, must have raigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the yeares of these three descents, by inserting some, whose raignes might fil vp the whole continuance of the captinitie, with which the time allotted by Berofus and others, to Euilmerodach and Balthafar, joyned vnto the yeares following the ninetcene of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierufalem was laid defolate) are Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeares of Euilmerodach in this fort. They fay, that the 18 yeares given to him by Iofephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should bee read and numbred 28 yeares, and the two yeares 20 that Berofus hath allowed to Euilmerodach should be written 23:in the first number the figure of (1) is militaken for the figure of (2) and in the later there should have bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2:) this granted (to wit) that Euilmerodach raigned 28 yeares, whereof fine together with his father, and 23 after his death, and the same number of 23 added to the 25 which Nabuchodonosor lived after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 49, then 4 yeares of Niglisar according to Berosus, o moneths of Labaffardach his sonne, and 17 yeares of Labonidus or Balthafar make vp the number of 70 yeares to the first of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken, in all copies extant; you how weake a foundation do they build, who have nothing to helpe them, faue onely the bare 40 names of two vnknowne Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had beene entirely extant, were not worthic, to have that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie ?

1 more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and raignes of the Babylonian Kings.

Ther suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, 50 I purposely forbeare to rehearse, as falling under the same answere. That of lofeph Scaliger I may not forget, as descruing to be considered apart from the rest. He gives to Nabuchadnezzar 44 yeres, to Enilmerodach 2, to Belfazer, 5: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19 of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus heaccomptethonely 59 yeares; beginning (as many do) the captinitie 11 yeares fooner, from the transportation of Icchonia. But hereof enough hath beene faid already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running betweene the 19 of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Chaldaan Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars raigne, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he giues to Enilmerodach is very thort, and more precisely agreeing with Berofus than with the Scriptures. For wee 10 find in Ieremy, that this Euilmerodach in the first of his raigne, shewing all fauour to Iechonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eate bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certaine, all the dayes of his life terem. 52. verf untillhe died. The very found of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than 33.034. the authoritie of Berofus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farrelonger time than 2 yeares, wherein Icchonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort fent by God, whose commaundement he had obeyed in yielding himselse to Nebuchadnezzar. Indeed how long techonia did liue it can not be proued; but plaine it is hereby that all his remaining daies he did not eate bread before this King. Now that he li-20 ued not so short a while after this as 2 yeares, it is more than likely, for he was but 55 yeres old when he was fet at liberty, having been 37 yeares in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18 yeares; after which time it seemes plaine that hee begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is faid to have beene but a yong man, and one of Darius his Pages three score yeares after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it selfe.

Of Belfazer, to whom Scaliger gives the next five yeares naming him also Laborofoardoch, I should wonder why he calles him Nabuchadnezzars daughters sonne, we reitnot that herein I find him very carefull to helpe out Berofus, by shifting in his Ninglissoror, as husband to Nabuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his 30 fon foure of these yeares; by which meanes there remaines about one yeare to Bel-(azer alone, agreeing neerely with the o moneths affigned by Berofus to the fonne of Niglifar . But Ieremy hath told vs that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his fon, and to his fonnes fonne (not to his daughters fonne) that the Empire was promifed: which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to paffe it oper with filence. Nabonidus the last of these (whome others, desirous to reconcile Berofus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthafar, is by Scaliger thought to bee Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berofian: for Berofus makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the travaile of 40 that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the lone of truth) but to shew that he himselfe having in some points disliked those Writers, whomein generall he approueth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the scriptures, wherein can be no errour. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whome Berofus calles Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies vnto vs, that Darius tooke the kingdome, not saying that hee wanne it by force of armes; Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, 50 or of the Greeke translation, which expressing no force of armes doth only signifie, that Darius tooke or received the kingdome; I see no reason why we should thereupon inferre, that the next king entred by Election : seeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthafars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecie. Neither could it indeede haue properly beene faid (if Danie! had cared to vie the most expressive termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the citie, did win the kingdome; feeing this was performed by Cyrus in the abfence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vie. Now concerning the fragment of Mezasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the yeare 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megafihenes, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchedone for, was more valiant than Hercules; that hee subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Mags farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldreans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a diuine furie, he cried with a loude voice. O Babylonians, I foretell yee of a great calamitie that shall come uppon you, which nevther Bel, nor any of the Gods shall evert : There will come & Persian, halfe an Affe, 10 that shall bring flauery exponsee : and that, this and the like when he had spoken, be vanished. Of all this I belocue little or nothing, fauing that Nabnehodonofor knew before band, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold from the golden head, to the filter breaft. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor probable.

If Sociligers copie of Eufekius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonofor wanne both Afrike and Spaine, I believe the fragment fo much the leffe: and am as little moued with the authoritie of it, where it calles a Median the pride and confidence of the Affrians, as where it tells of Nabuchadnezzar his owner anithing away. Indeed that fame title of halfe an Affe, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more nobleon the mothers fide, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Affes vpon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnitie and coherence which it hath within it felfe, I calily allow it. But this proues nothing, for meere fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man beleeue that one so indicious, industrious and deepely learned as Iofeph Scaliger, would ouer-shoote himselfe in setting downerepugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeale. And herein it feemes that Scalinger, well knowing his 30 owne fufficiencie, hath beene little carefull to fatisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecie of Daniel were true, that the kingdome of Balthafar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians, either wee must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must bethinke our selves what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthafar loft his life and kingdome, than that his kingdome was diviuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to have beene Darius, they should be thought to have done; but thefe two Nations did compound the body of that 40 Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the subject provinces, insomuch that the Greeke Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made vpon Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yea to cleare this point, euen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Iofeph Scaliger, for maintaining upon fuch good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Children King by him fubdued. Neither was Iolephus to be the leffe regarded for affirming that Balthafar was destroyed by Darim of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though herein hee varied from Berofus, and 70 others, whose authoritic elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Iosephus had no reason to beleeue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniels, whom I beleeue that hee understoode as farre as was needefull in this case. Lawfullit was for him to alleage al Authorsthat had any mention, though unperfect of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Jewes, to whose histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might feeme fabulous. Euen fo doe Eufebius, and other Christian Writers, willingly embrace the testimonies of heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars, yet will they not therefore be tried in generall by the felfe same Ethnicke philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as tolephus in this case hath left Berofus. And thus much I thought it meete to fay of Sealigers opinion in this point; holding neuertheleffe in due regard his learning and judgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had bin very great.

What may be held as probable of the Perfons an ! Times of NABVCHO-DUNOSOR his fucceffors.

T now remaines that I freely acknowledge mine owne weaknes, who cannot find how the 70. yeares of captinitie are to be divided among them which raigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wiseas already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to cannot find how the 70. yeares of captiuitie are to be divided among 🗶 the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truely fay with Pererius, that wee ought liberally to pardon those whose feete have failed them in the slipperie wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulnefle, or heedeleffe reckoning. Yet will I aduenture to deliuer my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding those onely to have raigned ouer Chaldwans, whose Names are found in the Scriptures) appeares more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniectures before rehearfed. Not that I will take vpon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee supposeth by Wiglifar and Labofardach to be meant the fame persons which are called in Scriptures Euilmerodach and Balthafar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but 30 onely to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of feuenty yeares. First therefore let vs consider the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth yere Ierusalem was taken and fackt, but in his nineteenth layd

Most of Writers have given to him 43. yeares of raigne, following therein Berofur. There are who have added one years more; and some have made it vp 45. To dispute about the certainctic were needelesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall show the certaine truth.

Manifestitis, that the 19. yeare of Nabuchadnezzar, is joyned with the 11. of 2.Kin. 2.5.8. Zedekia; as alfo that his eight yeare, was the first yeare of Iechonia his captinitie; the of icom. 51.12 40 raigne of Zedekia occupied all the meane space being of 11. yeares. This is generally 2.14.12. agreed upon, to that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his fue- 2. Substracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nebuchad-

It is now to be confidered how the remainder of the feuentic yeres were divided betweene the kings ruling in Bibylon vntill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I faid before ) than greatly needefull : the whole fumme being certaine, and the diftinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who way before the captiuitie of Inda, and ruine of the citie, we have remaining fix and twenty yeares of the fenentie, that were almost wholy spent, when his sonne began were long after the time of Iolephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe were flouthfull Princes. Neither can any man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70. yeares, for that the distribution of some part of them is only conjecturall; feeing that none who gives any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both vnlikely and desperate conjectures in dimding them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others have done; knowing well before hand, that who focuer faall discouer my errour, must doe mee the pleasure (which I could rather with in a case more materiall) of making mee to vinderstand

Of the foure and fortie yeares remaining in accompt at Nabuchadnezzars death. we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authoritie good enough to warrant vs from blame of prefumption, in giuing vs feuenteene yeares to Balthafar, we finde left in our handes to befrow you Englangrodach fixe and twentie yeares. Of the yeare belonging to Darius the Alede I have alreadie spoken what I thought sufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captiuitie. That Balchafar did raigne feuentcene yeares, we haue the authoritie of tofephus, before cited in expresse wordes; We haue also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berofus his Nabonidus, who raigned fo long; and Balthafar to have beene one. But nothing moueth mee fo Banes, 8, v. 1. 6. much to believe this Tradition, as first those evident places in Daniel, shewing that 27.00 c.5. .... in the third yeare of Balthafar he followed the Kinges bulineffe, and yet was forgot. 20 ten ere the end of his raigne, (a proofe sufficient of no few yeares, passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels emploiments tooke end cither that yeare or the next.) Secondly, the confideration of Cyrus his warres against the Asyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time, though wee make large allowance to his deedes in the lower Asia, which fell out in the mid-way: I, haue alreadie shewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the raigne of Enilmerodach was not short; and that men of great judgment have found it most probable that hee was King three and twentie yeares. More, Ithinke, they would have allowed him, had not the defire of fatis- 30 fying Berofus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berosus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke paffages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and mall thinges else vinquettionably true, I would not therefore condescend vinto him in fome one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemie. How much leffe ought I to obay a broken fragment of his, containing only feuen or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they beleeve that follow him in the reft? The Scriptures have told vs that God gave the Empire to Nabuchadnezzar, to his fonne, and to his fonnes fonne: How long each of them held it, wee finde not expressed; 40 yet would we gladly know it of Berofus, or of any other that would teach vs. prouided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroy not thereby the generall truth. More wordes are needleffe. It is enough to fay with others, that Berofus or In fephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelefnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for sixe and twentic, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more casic. For the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. fignifying 6. hath a nearer refemblance of & that flands for 2. than hath 2 which is vied for 3. So that the numerall notes $ 5 expressing 26, were not fafe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mis- 52 chance not vnufuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in 8 2 standing for 23. I doe not well perceive. As for the arithmeticall figures now in vie, they not appertaine to this businesse; vnlesse we should ghesse that his workes were corrupted in that vulearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a fort wholly given over to the doctrine of Arifotle. If this will ferue to make Berofus our friend, fo let it be; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking Ieremie and Daniel, when they seeme his opposites. VII. Of the victories which NABYCHODONOSOR obtained betweene the destruction of Ierusalem and conquest of Ith what actions this time of 70. yeares was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few haue written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peraduenture haue beene fome caufe that the time it f. Ife was, and is yet fought to bee abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witnessethelength of it. But by such an argument wee might as well 20 denie to many people euen their being. For euery Nation (I know not whom I should except) betweene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slouthfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruaile, if the posteritie of Nabuchodono for, finding all thinges readie to their hand, which their hearts could have defired, betooke themselves to their case and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall fonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wifedome greater. which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the reftleffe trauaile of purchafing. Though indeede the raigne of Nabuchodonofor was fo divided, that his youthfull and stronger yeares having beene exercifed in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to bee spent in e-30 flablishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthy labours past.

CHAP.I. $.7.

The nineteenth yeare of his raigne it was, when destroying vtterly the great and mightie Citie of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with aboundance of spoile, and terrified all that would offer to relift him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, vntill his three and twentieth years, he laboured in the conquest of those adjoyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, and commanded to weare his yoke; namely the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Siconians, and Experisins, though some of these were alreadic become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten downe and burnt. But the Tyrians whose Citie was founded on an Iland, fafe enough from any danger of a Land-Armie, and 40 whose fleet was so strong that they needed not to feare any enemie at Sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mightie Prince, imploying all his power to their fubuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleafed than any way discouraged with the fall of terufalem (which had held the fame course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the same quarrell against the common enemic) it appeares by the wordes which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; AHA, the gate exch.26.2. of the people is broken, it is turned onto mee; for feeing shee is defolite, I shall be excellenifbed. Yet at the length, even in the nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonofor, that great worke of his whereof wee haue alreadie spoken, beganne to appeare about the wa-50 ters, and threaten them with ineuitable mischiefe.

But those prophecies of Ieremie and of Esay, which appoint vnto this desolation Ier. 24. of Tire the same terme of 70. yeares, that was prescribed vnto the raigne of the E/ai.23.154 Chaldeans, doe plainely show, that shee followed lerusalem, the same nineteenth yeare of Nabuchodonofor, in the fame, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtieffe were memorable in the iffue of fo great and laborious a fiege, are in a manner vtterly loft. Thus much wee finde, That the Citizens perceiuing the Towns vnable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus, Neuertheleffe it feemes that this eualion ferued only the principall men, who efcaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer fort vnto the enemies furie. For not only fuch people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the fword; but the like execution was done in the tireets. into which with excelline labour the Afgrian made way for his Horses and Cha-Each ca. w.8. rios. Thus NABVCHODONOSOR caused his Armie to serve a great service against

TYRYS, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had be no mages, nor his Armic; but was faine to refl contented with the Honor of hauing destroied that Citie, which in all mens judgements had beene held inuincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, having made the name → of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the cares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonofor vsed the advantage of that reputation which hee had obtained by victories alreadie gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable with leffe paine. The Kingdome of Egypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Countrie to abounding in all riches and pleafures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himfelfe strong enough, to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemie to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it beene poorer, yet either it must have beene sub- 10 dued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue beene established. Neuerthelessein was needefull that before hee entred into this bufineffe, the Countries adjacent should be reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his denotion, or at least be viable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Aloab, Ammon, Edem, Damafeus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adjoyning Regions, whom God for their fins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian fwords, were fuch, as regarding only their owne gaine had some of them, like Rauens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feede vpon the carcaffes that fell by the crueltie thereof, others taking advantage of their Neighbours miseries, occupied the Coun- 20 tries which were by his victories belonging to Nabucho dono for; all of them thinking, that when the Afgrien had fatisfied his furie, he should be faine to for sakethose defolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand upon it. Particu-Exerb. 25, 12, 12 larly the Ecomites and Philipims had shewed much malice to the Ienes when their Citie was taken. What good feruice they had done to the Chaldeans, I finde not; if they did any it is likely to have been with reference to their owne purpofes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Ierufalem, but prefently they entred upon the Countrie of Gad, and tooke poffelfion, as if not the Afgrians, but they, had subdued Ifrael. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practife had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when hee fent 40 Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Inda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Gouernour ouer those that remained in Ifrael, and to carrie captine into the Ammonites Countrie the people that abode in Mizpah, than a delire of embroiling Nabuchodono/or with fo many labours at once, as should make him retire into his Ierem. 40.14. Owne Countrie, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom 41.2.5.10. they lay conveniently. Such or the like policie the Asabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their diffimulation condemned,

All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon defarts ; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vttermost 50 cunning of their thecuish wits. But Nabuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their denices by tharpe and fuddaine warre, ouer-whelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Ieremie, and Ezekiel, who fore-told, with little difference of wordes, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the mi-

ferie that should come vpon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seemes that Most was the last which felt his hand : for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of Efay, threatning Moab with destruction after three veares, as having reference to the third yeare following the ruine of Ierusalem: the next yeare after it being spent in the Agyptian expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made flaues, few excepted, who being preserved by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against 2 abuchodono for, but lived as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches; vntill the end of the seuentic yeares, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Iuda.

d. VIII.

That Ægypt was conquered, and the King therein raigning flaine by NABVCHODO. NOSOR, contrarie to the opinion of mast Authors: who following HERO-DOTVS and DIODORVS, relate it othermile.

Hen by a long course of victoric Nabucho dono for had brought into subiection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wife that no enemie to himselfe, nor friend of the Agyptian, was left at his back, that might give impediment vnto his proceeding, or take aduantage of any misfortune; then did hee forth-with take in hand

the conquest of Agypt himselfe, upon which those other Nations had formerly beenedepending. Of this expedition, and the victorious iffue thereof, the three great Prophets Elix, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, haue written so plainely, that I hold it altogether needlefle to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleaged out of these. Neuerthelesse wee finde many and good Au-30 thors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to straine these prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a sense, as gives to 2 abuchodonofor little more than the honour of having done some spoile in £gypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and fecond helps conducing to their purpose, that often times they preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vp-hold a fentence giving testimonic to one clause, doe careless ouerthrow the historie it selfe, which thereby they sought to haue maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of 40 £3 pt, which raigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former booke: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved vnto this place. Herodotus affirmes that he was a very fortunate King , but wherein hee telleth not; Herod. 12. 614 (vnleffe we should understand that he was victorious in the Warre which he is said to have made vpon Tyrus and Sidon) that hee raigned five and twentie yeares, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne subjects; who did set vp Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Agyptians hee imputeth to a great losse which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroied. This calamitie the people of Agypt thought to bee well pleafing to their King, who had fent them on this dangerous

30 expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so hee might with greater fecuritie raigne ouer fuch as staied at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of fuch as were flaine, rebelled against Apries, who fent Amasis to appeale the tumult; but Amasis became Captaine of the rebells, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land confented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust vnto his forraine Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whome hee kept in readinesse thirtie thousand good Souldiours that fought valiantly for him, but were vanquished by the great numbers of the Agyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amalis for a while, vntill the Agyptians, exclaiming ypon him as an extreame enemie to the land, got him delinered into their handes, and strangled him, yet gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Hers-D'ador Sie lib. dotus, with whome Diodorus Siculus neerely agrees, telling vs that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phanicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demolished 19 Sidon, wanne the other towns of Phanieia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished as is before rehearsed, when he had raigned two and twentic yeares. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Aprics his historic, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the destruction of Agret by the Babylonian, fore-told by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our beliefe, than have the traditions of Agretian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to per-E(4.20, vo. 4.5). Iwade those that looke only into humane reasons. For E/sy prophecied long before of the shamefull captivitie of the Agyptians, whom the King of Assbur should caror the manuful capations of the cary your state the lener who fled vito them for ry away naked, yong and old, in fuch wife that the lener who fled vito them for deliuerance from the Afgrian, should be assumed of their owne vaine considence in men fo vnable to defend them felues.

But Ezekiel and levemy, as their prophecies were nearer to the time of execution, fo they handled this Argument more precifely. For Ezekiel telleth plainely, that Agypt should be given to NabuchAmezzar, as wages for the service which beehad done at Tyre: Also he resounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Agypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed and goe into captiuitie; yea, that Eggh 32 v.31. PHARAOH and all his armieshould be saine by the sword. Wherefore it must reedes be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an infurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alteration in £3/pt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasia did succeed vn. 30 to Apries, by force indeede, but by the vniforme confent of all the people. Certainely, if that notable place of Ieremie, wherein he foretelleth how the Iewes in A gypt should see Pharsoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had beene, were to beereferred vnto the time of that rebellion whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath ouer-ruled it, then was it vainely done of the same Prophet ( which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeinghe did it by the appointment of God himfelfe) to hide in the clay of a Bricke-hil, those very stones, vpon which the throne of Nabuchodonofor should be set, and his paullion spread. Yeathen was that prophecie no other than falle, which expressed the end of Pharcov thus. Behold, I will wishe the common people of No., and PHARAOH and Ægypt, with their Gods and their Kings, euen P HARAOH, and all that trust in him: and I will deliner them into the hands of those that seeke their lines, and into the hand of Na-

BUCHADNEZZVA King of Babel, and into the hands of his feruants. The clearenes of this prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in sitting all to the Greeke Historians. Wherefore looking vpon Junius, who had in an other place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis, and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Agyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus 50 with lies, coined vpon a vaine-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And furely it may well be thought, that the historie of Nabuchadnezzar, was better knowne to the Ieres whom it concerned, than to the Greekes that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather believe Iosephus, reporting that Nabucho donosor in the three & twentieth yeare of his raigne, and the fift yeare of the destruction of Ieru(alem, did conquer Agypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his flead, than Herodotus or Diocore; who being meere strangers to this businesse had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would 6.11. tell them. Now if fetting afide all aduantage of authoritie, we should only confider the relations of Iolephus, and of the Greeke Historians, as either of them might bee verified of it selfe by apparant circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets or Agyptian Priests; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be approto ued as having beene wrought by confent of the people, but affords great matter of fuspition; yea though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore, For the great loue and honour which the Agyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme testimonic of all others that have handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can wee thinke it probable, that Apries having wonne great victories, did for one only loffe fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may ferue to perswade vs, that a King of £gypt would feeke, or so demeane himselfe, that he might be thought to seeke the destruction of his natural subjects? As for that armie of thirtie thousand souldiours Carians and Ionians, which the King of Agypt whom Amalis tooke prisoner. 20 is said to have kept for his defence: doth it not argue that hee was a forrainer, and onethat armed himselfe against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weake; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as affuredlytheir owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than anie way needefull, to vse all Arguments that might be alleadged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amalis, who fought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that hee was some forcen Gouernour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would have defired to fauchis life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yeelded, though it had 20 flood vpon great apparance of truth, considering that the voyce of Trueth it selfe cries out against it; but leave the circumstances proving the Conquest of Agypt

by Nabuchodonofor to be observed, where due occasion in course of the storie fol-

T is a great losse, that the generall Historie of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should have preserved the memorie of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mightie Prince Nabuchodonofor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vn-Certaine. That his victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-

Provinces, were fuch as did more enlarge his dominion, than all his former warres had done, it may casily be gathered out of Ezekiel: who reckons up in his thirtieth chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to haue reached out into Mauritania, as people subdewed by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these warres are in a maner vererly lost, 50 but that the victory was case and swift, any man shall find, who wil take the pains to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular observation; that Pharoah, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe safe in Agypt by the well defenced fituation of his Countrey, did very vnwifely in fuffering his enemies ВЬЬЬ 2 ion in Ierem. £.44.verfe 30.

CHAP.I. S.10.

to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and adhærents in Syria. For as the labour of this bufineffe did more harden than wearie the Chaldean army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Agyptians, relying vpon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make through the Arabian defarts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would afford vinto themselues, did litle auaile them in prouition for the warre, and much aftonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being viually feene, that the hearts of men faile, when those helpes faile, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the kingdome of Agypt had flourished vnder the rule of the Phiraohs, about a thousand flue hundred and soure score yeares; but from this time forward it remained fortie yeares without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recour by litle and litle the former greatnes, yet fo, that it was never dreadful vnto others, God having faid of that people, I will diminish them that they shall no more rule the Nations. For wher-Exch. 19.13,14, as it hath been faid of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the auncient Kings; and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Agypt now became fooles, the river failed them, the King himselfe was taken and flaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguilhed. This came to paffe in the first yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth tosophani Ind. of Nabuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Iosephus) Hee slew the King then raigning, 10 placed an other in his roome, and carried captines thence to Babylon, the Iewes whome hee found in that Countrie. Now concerning the time which Josephus gives vnto this bufinesse, and the businesse it selfe, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which infinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusa lem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three and twentieth years of NEBVCHADNEZZAR, is not vnprobably thought by good authors to have been at the returne from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Iosephus tells vs that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nabuchadnezzar, we must viderstand, that he was onely a Vierroy, and not (as some have mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his raigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadne-2 zar, were as well repugnant vnto the Prophecies before alleadged, as to all Chronologie and historie. Some there are, which to helpe this inconvenience imagine that there were two fuccessively bearing the name of Amalis, others that there were two Apries, the one flaine by Nabuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was depriued of life and kingdome by the Asfiriums. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the deputie of Nebuchadnezzar, seeing that hee was the Grand-child of Pharao Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phanisi-40 ans, who were, before the Egyptians, become subject vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde perhappes, that he whom Nabuchadnezzar left as Gouernour of Agypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldsan or Asyrian, than Agyptian name; vnleffe wee should thinke that hee had beene a traitor to his natural! Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenant ship of the Country: about which it were but friuolous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleeue, that Nabuchodonofor made an absolute Conquest of Agypt; that he was not so foolishas to giue it away, any man may gueffe, that he appointed one to rule the Countrey, it is confequent vnto the former, and hath authoritie of Iofephus; that this Gouernour (or some successour of his) was afterwards taken and slaine by Amasis, I see pro- 50 babilitie enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well be content, that others vse their libertie, and beleeue what they lift. As for the armie which this £gyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the garrisons of mercenarie souldiours which were left by the Asyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custodie of the new subdewed Province : as likewise the company returning from Cyrene and Barce, who togither with the friends of fuch as were flaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greeke Historians, deposed and slew Apries, I take them to have beene the Agyptian fugitives which then recouered their owne Countrie. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezewhich then reconstruction of fortie yeares will I gather the Ægyptians from the people kel was verified, At the end of fortie yeares will I gather the Ægyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I willbring agains the captivitie of Ægypt, and will cause & 14. them to returne into the land of Pathrosinto the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small kingdome. If the Egyptian Prichts alluded hecreunto in the tale which 10 they made of Amalis his obtaining the kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they denifed matter that had no shadow of truth, onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countries difgrace; then are they little to be regarded, fince we know the truth with them.

of the fundry accompts drawne from fundry acts of NEBVCHADNEZZAR and of the destruction of Niniuie, by him; the time of which action is uncertaine.

Hele victories brought the greatnes of the Assrian Empire to the sull and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzars raigne in fundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might eeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument : Yet thus much I Dancet & 2. will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captine in the third yeare of Iehoiakims raigne (which ranne along with some part of Nebuchadnezzars first yeare) and was kept in diet three yeares more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nabuchadnezzari kingdome, wherein he interpreted the 30 forgotten dreame of the great image, forelhewing the succession of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of divers places which referre fundry matters vnto their fet yeares; as that of Ezekiel before-cited, where hee fore-tells that Aegypt should be given in reward for the service done before Tyrus, dating his prophecie in the feuen and twentieth yeare; and that of Daniel, placing the crection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for these yeares held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nabuchadnezzars kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captilities, but had reference to some memorable action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine fearch.

Of any warre made by Nabuchadnez zar after such time as hee returned from the Conquest of Aegypt I doe not reade: excepting that against Niniuie, the destruction > whereof was fore-tolde by the Prophet Naum. Niniuie had long before beene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath beene shewed) and together with the rest of Afiyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldwan, as Iehoiakim & Zedekias tributary Kings of Iuda had done. tafted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Niniuie followed the Conquest of Aegypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made betweene this Citie that was to fall, and the Citie of Are in Accept that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinkes) vnpossible Nabum 3.0.

to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nabuchadnezzars raigne; the place of Nahumlast cited is enough to disproue it, Whereas it is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which beganne at the end of the Aegyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Nahum which went betweene the one and the order, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time inter-current. So that to enquire into the very years of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether menaged by Wabuchodonofor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiofitie of Tyberius Cafar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would feeke to learne what woman that Huzzab Queen of Niniuie was, whose wofull captiuitie the same Prophet Naum likewise did fore-tell.

δ. X I. Of the later time of NEBUCHADNEZZAR; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

F the time which this great Monarch Spent in quiet, I thinke there are no monuments extant; faue those which wee finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great workes at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well that he brake out into these glorious wordes. Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my maiestie? Surely if those thinges be true that are by Infephus rehearsed of him out of Berofus and Measthenes, hee might well delight himselfe with the contemplation of such 20 goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is faid, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that belides other stately workes, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the aire, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Afgrian, and all the Persian Empire, is faid to have beene reared, and finished in fifteene daies.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not undeseruedly fell these judgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happinesse in his ownelise, 39 but with a discouerie of thinges to come after him, yea and had approved the certaintie of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memorie, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: hee neuerthelesse became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that hee caused a golden Image to be fet vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vtterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; velox obliuio veritatis, vi qui dudum seruum Dei quasi Deum adorauerat, nunc statuam sibi sieri tubeat, vt ipse quasi Deus in statua adoraretur : A hastie forget- 40 fulneffe of the truth, that hee who fo lately had worshipped (DANIEL) the seruant of God, as if hee had beene God himfelfe, fibuld now command a Statua to bee creeted unto himselfe, wherein himselse might bee worshipped as God. From this impicticit pleased God to reclaime him, by the strange and wonderfull deliuerie of those bleffed Saints out of the fierie fornace; who being throwne into it bound, for refuling to commit Idolatrie, were affifted by an Angell; preferued from all harme of the fire; loofened from their bands; and finally called out with gratious wordes, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amased at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his image he had violated. Yet this denotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not forooted in him, that it could 50 bring forth fruit answerable to his hastic zeale. Therefore was hee forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible judgement hanging ouer his head, which Daniel expounding, aduited him to breake off his finne by righteousness, and his iniquitie by mercie towards the poore, that there might bee an healing of his error. Hereby it seemes that iniustice and crueltie were the faults, for which hee was threatned, but this threatning sufficed not vnto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch thould be driuen from among men (according to the tenor of the dreame and interpretation) vea compelled to dwell with the beafts of the field, and made to cate graffe as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans judgement, that casily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeares end. One whole yeares leifure to repent was given to this haughtic Prince: which respite of the execution may seeme to haue bred in him a forgetfulnesse of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelue moneths, walking in the roiall Palace of Babel, hee was so ouer-ioyed 10 and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heavie judgement pronounced against him, heevitered those loftic wordes before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Maiesticall workes which he hadreared, as well befeeming his maiesticall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heaven, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearfed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, which was fulfilled voon him the very fame houre.

That Salomon and many other Princes and great ones, haue taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that euer I haueread of any, that were punished for rejoyeing in workes of this kinde (though 20 it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde to keepe a just measure) excepting only this Nabuchainezzar.

CHAP-I-S.II.

The like may be faid of Dauid: for other (and some very godly) Kings have mufired all their forces to the very last man; but few or none have been knowne to have been punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to rejoyce in those good things, wher with God hath bleffed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulneffe to entertaine them with a fullen and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure cloudes, hindring the influence of that bleffed light, which clarifies the foule of man, and ? predifposeth it vnto the brightnesse of eternall selicitie; so that insolent ioy, which 20 man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceiueth of his owne worth, doth aboue all other passions blast our mindes, as it were with lightening, and make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our feeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilest him, to whom wee are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these mala mentis gandia; The euill ioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than forrowes, cares, and feares; not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no vnlikely token of vengcance neare at hand, when these vnreasonable slushes of proud and vame toy, doe rage in a minde, that should have beene humbled with a just repentance and acknowledgement of ill descruing.

This was verified upon Nabuchadnezzar, whose punishment was fingular and vnexampled. For he ranne among beafts in the fields and woods, where for feuen yeares hee liued, not only as a faluage man, but as a faluage beaft, for a beaft hee thought himselfe fecundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore L. a. de Reg. fed himselfe in the same manner, and with the same foode that beasts doe; Not that pri. he was changed in figure externall according to Mediana, in formuch as he appeared Mediana, derea beaft to other mens cies, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knowes) Ha in Deum fide speakes of a woman that appeared to all other mens fight a Cow, but to Hilarins 129.7. only a woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was faid to be into a Hinde, nor made a Monster as Dorotheus and Epiphanius drea- Dorin Symps.

ding, and his estate, for which hee acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power and euerlasting being; that he was the Lord of heauen and D.M.4.1.32.c. carth, and wrought without reliftance what he pleafed in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gaue argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his faluation; namely S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthu famise, and others. And for that place of Efay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Isay both in the thirteenth and sourteenth Chapter speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon iountly.

of Evilmerodach.

Auing alreadic spoken what I could of the succession and yeares of Nabuchadnezzars posteritie; the most that may bee said of him, is faid of Euilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearfe.

He lost some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warrethat confumed it to alhes. He lost Agypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, which was for- 20 tie yeares after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amelis foure and fortic yeares of raigne; nor with that of Diodorss, who gives him five and fiftie, faying that he died in the third yeare of the threefcore and third Olympiad, when Camby les did conquer Agypt. There were indeed but seuen and thirtie yeares, which passed betweene the second yeare of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad (which was the nineteenth of Euilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his raigne, wherein hee wanne Agypt; of which seuen and thirtie yeares it is credibly held, that P samennitus, the fonne of Amasis, raigned three : so that Amasis could be no longer King than foure and thirtie yeares. But feeing that thefe two Greeke Historians haue beene abused 30 by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marualle though they were also deceived in the length of his raigne. This is the plaine answere to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie fet downe in flead of foure and thirtie, or that Amalis did temporife a white with the Asyrians, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Egypt, vntill the nineteenth of Euilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath beene proued out of Ezekiel, that Agypt became againe a Kingdome) I hold it a fuperfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptish troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Enilmer odach, as with a Prince greater in fame, and reputation, gotten by the 40 decaied valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather thinke) fome foile received by the Afgrian invading Media, emboldened the Agyptians to rebell against him: I will neither undertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tells that the first service of yong Cyrus in warre was under Astrages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Asyrian Prince, who did set vpon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or fixteen yeares old. If therefore Cyrus lived threefcore and three yeares (as he is faid to have died well ftricken in yeares) which is held to be the ordinarie terms of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeare of Euilmerodach his raigne. Yet by the fame reckoning it should follow, that the warre beganne more early betweene these Nations, for as much as the manner 50 of their fight in former times, with other circumstances infinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonofor gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome Neighbour, to stand vpon prouder termes with the Asyrians, than in his flourishing citate they durft haue vsed. How societ the quarrell beganne, weefinde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Afgrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proude to digest the losses which he received by the Medes and their Alies the Perjans, drew vnto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the leffer Alia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to ouer-whelme his Enemies with a strong inualion, whome in vaine hee had sought to wearie out with a lingring

This happened after the death of Aftrages, who left the World in the nineteenth veare of Eudmerodach, at which time Analis tooke possession of Egypt. So that the Affirian having his handes alreadie full of bufineffe, which more carneftly did affect him, seemes thereby to have given the better meanes unto the Agiptians, of new creeting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did fundric times finde occasion to rebell in after-ages, and fet vp a King within it felte, against the

The iffue of these great preparations made by Euilmerodach against the Medes, was fuch as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many yeares before vttered against Babel by E/ay and Ieremic.

For the Asyrians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to haue buried the Atedes, and Perstans, under their thicke shewers of arrowes and 20 darts, were encountred with an armie of flout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battaile, wherein Eutimerodath was flaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonofor had raifed and vp. held, being shaken and grieuously crackt under his unfortunate Sonne, was left to bee sustained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to haue ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repaire it, when it was in way of falling.

A. XIII.

A private coniecture of the Author; scruing to make good those thinges, which are cited out of BEROSVS, concerning the Successors of EVILMERO-DACH, without wrong to the truth: the qualitie, and death of BALTHASAR.

Hough I have alreadic (as it seemes to mee) sufficiently proved that Balthafar was the Sonne, and immediate Successour to Euilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the conjectures of those Writers, which following Berofus, insert Niglisar or Niriglissor, and his sonne Labas-[ardach betweene them : as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitoris a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie; I haue thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what meanes it was possible that some errour might have crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby haue brought vs to a needleffe trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle light, in the vicertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by day light, had weadhered only to the Scriptures. First, therefore I obscrue, that the time which Berofus divides betwixt Euilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the yeares in which Nabuchadnezzar lived wild among brute 50 bealts in the open field : Secondly, that the suddainenesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that state, wherein doubtleffe the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitic pittied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recoucrie, as being verified in that which had been more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for fetling the government, whileft the King was thus diffracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the roiall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesses. In this his rule Enilmerodach being to supplie the vtter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the vnripenesse of it in yong, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small abilitie of gouernment, it appeares by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his owne right. That his Sifter Nitocris (if Nitocris were his fifter) was a woman of an high spirit, it appeares by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that shee was more cunning than Semaramis, as appeared in her magnificent and viefull workes about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Bal ylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Afgrians, and amongst them Amue, Wherefore it were not vnreasonable to thinke, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers mifgouernment, yfed practifes to get the rule into her owne handes, and afterwards, as a Mother, to leaue it vnto her vngratious fonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitoeris could have raigned, wee doe not finde; but we finde in Berofus (as Isfephus hath cited him) that Wiglifar, who got the Kingdom from Euilmerodach, was his fifters hulband; which argues this to have been the fame woman. As for Labaffardach the fonne of Niglifar, if at the end of nine Monoths raigne he were for his leud conditions flaine by the Nobilitie, as the same Be-

rafus reporteth, it feemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nabuchadnezzars reflitution (whose terms of punishment was then expired) by raising such troubles as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the People. I will not here vie many wordes to confute that which Berefus hath further fet downe of Enthmerodach, telling vs that he was flaine by his fifters hufband: for the plaine words of Scripture naming the yeare wherein he gaue libertie to Iechonia, doe plainely tefline that he out-lived the three or foure and fortieth yeare of his Fathers raigne, 20

which was the last of his life. This may fuffice to fliew, that they who are faid to have fucceeded Enilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede have so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balihafar who was his Sonne and Heire, we finde, that he had fuch conditions, as God permitteth to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his yong yeares of a mischieuous nature; hauing in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should have married his lifter, only for spight and envieto fee him kill two wild beafts in hunting, at which himfelfe having throwne his Jaueline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beautic, faid it were a happie woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous vilanies caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gratious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemie as foone as he was King. Neither doe I finde that he performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole hee loft all; fitting fill, and not once daring to give battaile to them that daily tooke somewhat from him; Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on enery fide, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miscrable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable securitie, yet had not that happinesse (such as it is) of a death free from apprehension of feare, but was terrified with adreadfull vision, which had shewed his ruine not many houres before, 50 euen whilest he was drinking in that wine, which the swordes of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest bloud. It is therefore in this place enough to fay of him, That after a dishonourable raigne of seuenteene yeares he perished like a beast, and was slaine as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath beene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose storie that of Balthasar is but an ap-

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the subuersion of the Babylonian Empire.

HE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Allyria, wasioyned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Asyria and of

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings belides himfelfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Prouinciall Gouernours having cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided betweene them the Easterne Empire.

Cyaxares ( whom the Scriptures call Darius Mediu ) the last of the race of Arbaces dying about two yeares after that the Line of Belochus was ended in Balthafar: the Dominions as well of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which bloud raigning in Perfia; had formerly beene dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Familie of Achamenes, and Line of the Perfan Kings, wee shall hereafter finde occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third some of Liphet; that they had Kings soone after the floud, Lactantius and Diodorus have found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodor speaketh of Pharnus with his seuen Sonnes, slaine by the Asyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Asyrians. I take the list and number from Ensebius, adding Darius Mediu: of whome I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are 50 thefe.

And though the Greekes afcribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious ouer Balthafar was his; as the Allrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his ownelife. For wee finde in Daniel that Darius of the Medes tooke the Kingdome being threescore and two yearesold, And further what Officers it pleased him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was Cap.13.0.17.51. it prophecied by Ifay long before: Behold I will stirre up the Medes against them, &c.

And by IEREMIE; The Lord hathraifed up the Spirit of the King of the Medes, for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Mations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes 20 thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. Thele Scriptures Iulius Affricanus doth well open, who taking authoritic from Diodor, Castor, Thallus, and others, deliuereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus beganne to raigne, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he faith, That as the Medes were fubiugated by the Persians, fo before that, both the Babylonians and Asyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Instine, and Herodotus, are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Eabylon to Cyrus alone.

Ow the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the handes of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians ; but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who denie that Asyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctefias on the contraric fide affir- 40 meth that Cyrus was no way descended from Aflyages (whom hee calleth Astigas or Apama) but only that having vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Baceria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I finde the relations of Ctelias often cited and feldome followed, and himfelfe fometimes very justly reproued of willfull vntruth.

Viginier a diligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such sonne as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirme his opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Justine, Strabo, Plato, Ariflotle, Isocrates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successiour. Neither doe Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Iulius Affricanus, 59 Clemens Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augufline, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hathgiven other Sonne or Succession to Astrages than Cyrus.

Yet feeing that this manner of argument ab authoritatenegatine, doth neuer in-force confent; we may bee the bolder (all this great lift of Noble Writers by him alleaged not withstanding) to affirme that either Afrages himselfe must have beene Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to give him some other Successour, according to losephus, and Aenophon, the zond Leage fame whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifelt, and without dispute, that the locantitio c 13 King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Con- Kind, e. P. ad. quelt, Cyrus during his life being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subject to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassalls of Darius, being soyned together to com-10 pound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselfe, not only for this action, but for the deliuerie of his Church; a greater worke in the eies of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchie, how

And it may well bee thought, that the Souldiers imployed in that feruice did rather ascribe the glorie to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling upon Gras by fuccession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue, which among prophane Historians ouer-grew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because hee was old, and did nothing in person; as also because hee soone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was posselt of what focuer belonged to Darius, before the fame of any fuch King or Conquerour was carried farre off.

And for the Greeke Historians, they tooke all thinges from the relations of the Persians. who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equall. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and fixt Chapters of his prophecies, makes it plaine that himselfe not only lived a great Officer under King Darius, but that hee continued in that effate to the first of cyrus, which being the yeare 30 of Daniels death, could not have beene distinguished from the raigne of Darius. if they had begunne together and raigned ioyntly; Neither can it bee imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus beganne after him.

X ENOPHONS relation of the Warre which the Medes and Persians made with loynt forces upon the Asyrians and others.

Hele Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, are yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these warres: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Asyrian had inlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, hee beganne to hope that if the Medes could bee brought under his subjection, there should not then bee left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of 50 the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foote, and aboue ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being joyned made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Afgrian confidering the strength of such a Neighbour, inuited Crassus King of Lydia, a Prince very mightic both in men and treasure, and with him other Cccc 2

Lords of Alia the leffe to his affiftance, alleaging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmely conjoyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be calle, no not possible, for any one Nation to result them. With these incitements firengthned with great prefents, he drew to himfelfe fo many adherents a he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foote, and threescore thoufand horse, of which, ten thousand horse, and fortie thousand foote were led by Crafu, who had great cause of enmitte with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes; But this great Armie was by Craxares King of the One es, and by Cyrus generall of the Persian forces, vtterly broken; Vp. pon which defeat the Afgrian King being also flaine, so many of the Afgrians re- 10 uolted, as Babylon it felfe could not longer be affured without the fuccours of Mercinaries, waged with great fummes of money out of Afathe leffe, Egypt, and elfewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by cyrus, who following his advantage, possest himselfe of a great part of the lesser Afia, at which time it was, as I take it, that Crafus himfelfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following foone after, the Armielying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his fifters sonne, prevailed against Balthafar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leuied, are numbred thirtie thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the 20 common fort were Archers, or fuch as vsed the Dart and the Sling. So faire xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the patterne of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: So it cannot bee denied, but that the bulke and groffe of his Narration was founded upon meere Historical truth.

Neither can it indeed bee affirmed of any the like writer, that in enery speech and circumftance he hath precifely tied himselfe to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne invention, appropriating the fame to the times and persons of whom hee treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politique discourse, and examining but the Historic of thinges 30 done, it will easily appeare that Xenophon hath handled his under-taken subject in fech fort, that by beautifying the face thereof, hee hath not in any fort corrupted the bodie.

ð. IIII.

The eftate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great Warre.

Or it is commonly agreed upon, that Achamenes, the sonne of Perses 40 commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sur damapalus, and that being Gouernour of Persia, did affociate himselfe with Arbaces, who each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himselfethe Dominion of those Countries which he had formerly ruled for the Asyrians; as also that they conveyed over the same honor and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, until fuch time as Deioces tooke vpon him the full authoritie and maiestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the raigne of Deioces, are viually accompted about an hundred and fortie yeares, in the last fixtie whereof there raigned in Asyria mightic Princes, namely Salmanassar and his Successours, whose great atchiuements in Syria 50 and else where witnesse, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their aduantage to vnder-take any offensine warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet betweene these the successours of Belochus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Astrages, there past about ninetic yeares, in which if Herodotus haue written truely, that Phraortes conquered Perfu, and how he and other the Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commaunded many parts of Afia, it had beene but an vnaduised enterprise of the Assyrians and Babytonians, to have wasted themselves against the Syrians and Ægyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backes. But that the Aledes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Perlia, and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susians in Nabuchodonofors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Gouernour for the Babylonian in Susa or Susan, the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeed, that the Mediums, either vnder Cyanares or Africages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Crafus, which after some fix yeares dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It feemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then posfest, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more securitie than same: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achemenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not have suffered any forgetfulnesse thereof. But as we find all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countries to be very conso-20 nant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, that the race of Achemenes held the Principalitie of Persia from father to some for many descents. And therefore we may better gue credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Camby/es the father of Cyrus was King of Persia: than to those that make him a meane man, and fay, that Aftiages gaue him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her sonne (whose nativitie he seared) might be disabled from any great undertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Astrages, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asia? No; it was more likely, that vpon fuch a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child should have encreased, and his care 30 beene the greater to have married her to fome Prince of strength and eminent

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I thinke the deniser of the mischiefe intended against Cyrus by his grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achamenida was so renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperitie did thence deriue himselse, and vaunt of it: which he would neuer haue done, had they been ignoble, nor had they been the vaiffals of any other King or Monarch.

Of the second were those seuen great Princes of Persia, who having overthrowne the vsurped royaltie of the Magi, chose from among themselues Darius the sonne of Hyftajles King.

And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Persepolis; for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it. The first King of Persia to vs knowne, if wee follow the current of Au-touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo fayth, That the same was taken from a River which watereth Persia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name; Herodotus otherwife; and that Cyrus Strablis. fignifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people.

It is true that for his Iustice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any fuch fignification, I thinke it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to fay as the Plutarch wit. Sunne, in the same Language. Howsocuer it be, yet the Prophet E/ay, almost two drian. hundred yeares before Cyrus was borne, giues him that name, Thus faith the Lord unto CYRV's his annointed &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Prouinces thereto subicet, together with the taking of Crassus himselfe, are not recounted by Eusebius, 30 Orofius, and others, but placed among his later archicuements, whose opinion for this difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last warre against Crassis: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victorie which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the fine and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have beene vsed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honour of hauing woon B. bylon it selfe, which in due place I have answered. The later seemes to have reference to the second Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he fo established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations neuer offered to reuolt. 40 Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleeue with Herodotus, whome the most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to præcede that of Babylon.

Of CROESUS the King of Lydia, who made warre upon CYRVS.

Haue in the last Booke spoken somewhat of Crassiss, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which gouerned Lydia in more auncient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydus, the sonne of Atys: Which familie extinguished, the Kingdome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentic generations, Caundales being the laft, ho by shewing his faire wife naked to Gyges his fauorite, he was by the same Gyges

(thereto vrged vpon perill of his owne life by the Queene) the next day flaine. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queene and the Kingdome of Lyana, and left the fame to Atys his fonne, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes Hered, Lt. p.3, (who thrust the Cimerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Crufus: Which fine 4,05. Kings, of athird race, enjoyed that Kingdome an hundred and seuentic yeares. Halyattes the father of Crassus was an undertaking Prince, and after he had continued a warre against Cyanares the Median, a Prince verie powerfull, and maintained it lix yeares, a peace was concluded upon equal conditions betweene them.

Allyages, the fonne of Cyanares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himfelfe greatly honoured by obtaining Argenic, Crafus fifter, whom he married.

But Crafus fo fare enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Agyptian, and the Lydian: onely Nabuchodonofor, after he had joyned Phanicia, Paleflina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Crafiss, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet mastred Lolis, Loris, and Ionia, Proninces possest by the Greekes in Affathe leffe, adjoyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithinians, Carians, Mylians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also infort the Ephelians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Dianaes gir-Abe. 1.14 c. 17. dle, Herodotus witneffeth. Moreover, Athenaus out of Berofus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Crafus obtained against the Sacrans, a Nation of the Serihians, in memorie whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearely celebrate a Feaft, which they called Sacaa: All which hee performed in

> And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus fame, doubting alfo, that his profectous vndertakings might in the end grow perillous to him felfe he confulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom hee prefented with maruellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if 39 he undertooke him: from whom he received this riddle; CROESUS passing over the River Halys, shall diffolue a great dominion. For the divell being doubtfull of the fuccesse, payed him with marchandize of both sides like, and might be inverted either way to the ruine of Perfic, or of his owne Lydia.

CROESUS his Expedition against CYRVS.

Ereupon Crafus being refolued to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, 40 if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sandanes to the contrarie, who defired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not couered with the foft filke of wormes, but with the hard skinnes of beafts;

not fed with fuch meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he alreadie excelled : and if by them beaten , and fubiected, fo great would his loffe appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solide Councell, Crassus having prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he fought by all meanes to surprife or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydians encamped before it . That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not finde: for out of doubt, Crassiss as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilities so was hee not under any in territoric and fame that then liued.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the Gods, because they favoured a disturber and viurper of the Commonweale against him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from divine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Crafus prosperitie at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune readie to fall; and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not 10 Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given date to the one, and a beginning of glorie to

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainement of diuerse skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians beganne to joyne in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust on vpon the falling off, and aduauncement of either Nation: and as the Perssans had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Crassis doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recoursed Sardis his first Citie and Regall Scat, without any pursuite made by Cyrus to retard 30 him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrns approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the souldiors, and sent the troupes of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to reassemble at the end of fine moneths, acquainting his Commaunders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

d. IIII. The Conquest of Lydia by CYRVS.

CHAP.3. S.4.

YRVs in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be difcouered. But having good intelligence of Crassus his proceeding, he so measured his Marches, as he presented not himselfe before Sadis, till such time as Crassus had disposed his armie to their

Wintring garrisons: when being altogether vnlooked for, and vnfeared, he surrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Crafus having no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinarie Gards, after foureteene dayes siege the same was entred by affault, and all executed that refifted. Crafus having now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts frongly encompassed, thrust himselfe into in command 40 the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common calamitate fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of his, who had beene hebet sold fortune of the little of th dumbe all his life (by extremitie of passion and seare enabled) cried out to the soul- Com. diors to spare Crafus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoyled of Membrian meall things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and fet on a permittithe top of a great and high heape of wood, to be confumed to ashes thereon. To citamentum. had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cryed out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that innocation, he first vsed silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he now found it true which Solon had long 50 fince told him, That many men in the race and courses of their lives might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discerne himselfe for happie indeede, till his end. Of which answere Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of bomine calami of which aniwere c.yras being speedby mounted, remembring the change fortune and his owne mortalitie, he commanded his ministers of Justice to with the minist fat, the minister fat ministers of m draw the fire with all diligence to faue Crafus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demaunded of him, Who it was that had perfuaded him? Or what selfe reason had conducted him to inuade his territorie, and to make him of a friend an enemie? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous and my vnprosperous destinie (the Gracian God flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inverters and conductors of Crafus warre against Cyrus.

- Cyrus being pierst with Crassus answere, and bewayling his cstate, though victorious ouer it, did not onely spare his life, but entertained him euer after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercie indeed, Qua non causam sed fortunam (bectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned betweene that behauior which wee call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniuftly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his owne euill.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Crafus at the first fight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliuers, and is here alreadie set downe, that hee should have beene burnt aliue. It may well bee, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent fo cruell fitter to be for otten than rehearfed, as too much misbefeeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that necreneffe of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he beene other- 20 wife v tious) from fo cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoeuer it was, the Morall part of the Storic hath given credit and reputation to thereport of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it paffe for currant, though the trust reposed in Crassus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vie him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his armic ouer Araxes into Seythia, he left Crasus to accompanie and aduise his sonne Cambyses, Gouernour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of Cyrus, and didafterward follow Cimby/es into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world 30 tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lycians; in Balthafar, Cyaxares, and Crafus.

How CYRVS woon Babylon.

Fter this Lydian warre enfued the great Conquest of Babylon, which 40 gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mightie, that he was justly reputed the greatest Monarch then living vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooke vp, it is vncertaine; onely it feemes, that tenne whole yeares did paffe betweene his taking those two Cities of Sardes and Babylon, which neuerthelesse I doe not thinke to haue beene wholly occupied in prouision for the Affirian warre, but rather to haue beene spent in setling the Estate which he had alreadie purchased. And hercunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctesias hath in his fragments of a war made by Cyrus vpon the Serthians, though related as foregoing the victorie obtained against Crafus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious over that 50 Nation, tooke Amorges their King prisoner: but being in a second battaile ouerthrowne by the wife of Amerges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was delinered for the other.

Likewife it may be thought, that no fmall part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Grafus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he imploved Pactias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians under their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greekes inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Abdians, and Lycians, who refoluedly (according to the strength they had) defended themselues. But in the attempt vpon Babylon it selfe it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that noto thing should be able to divert him, or to rayle that siege, and make frustrate the workevpon which he did fet all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bendall his care and ftrength vnto the taking of that Citie, which beside the same and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was fo frongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with waters vnfoordable, so plentifully victualled for many yeares, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their chate, but despised and derided all purpoles and power of their beliegers.

The onely hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a Citie so well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and o-20 ther necessaries; whereof though the Towne was faid to be flored sufficiently for more than twentie yeares, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of peopleas dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would sooner appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the successe of this course, the besiegers were likely to endure much trauaile, and all in vaine, if they did not keepe itraight watch and strong gards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those wals which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently affured vnto their Commaunder: The confideration whereof ministred vnto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and o- Xemph. Ore-

30 thers, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who having beene their Ped. lb.7. auncient friends and allies, were more likely to joyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vie much diligence on the behalfe of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoake of seruitude. Whilest the belieged were plealing themselues in this deceitfull gladnesse, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of fuddaine calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inventive, denised by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the same from the wals of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and affured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, hee stayed the time 40 of his aduantage for the execution: for hee had left certaine bankes or heads vncut, betweene the maine river which furrounded the Citie, and his owne Trenches.

Now Bulthafar, finding neither any want or weakeneffe within, nor any possibilitic of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding fumptuous feaft, publike Playes, and other Passimes, and thereto inuited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, belides his wines, curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did cither to let the beliegers know, that his prouisions were sufficient, not onely for all needful! vles but euen for iolitic and excesse: Or because he hoped that his enemies, vnder the burthen of many distresses were well neere broken, or in honour of 50 Bel his most reuerenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equall, but (ving Daniels words) helisted himselfe up against the Lord of Heanen: For he and his Princes, wives and concubines, made carowling cuppes of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom he prayled his owne puppets,

(fayth S. HIEROME) drinking in golden Cuppes, to praise Gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthafar was in this fort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him certaine words which he understood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement feized him, as the joynes of his loynes were loofed, and his knees fmote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recovered, he cryed out for his Chaldeans, Aftrologians, and Southfayers, promiting them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the 10 writing; but it exceeded their art. In this disturbance and assonishment the Queene bearing what had past, and of the Kings amasement, after reverence done yied this specell: There is a man in thy Kingdome in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and understanding and wisdome, like the wisdome of the Gods. was found in him, whom the King NABYCHODONOSOR thy father, the King (1fay) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent spirit and knowledge and understanding &c. were found in him, even in DANIEL &c. Now let DANIEL be called, and he will declare the interpretation,

Orie. o Theod.

This Oucene, Io/ephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthafar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that shee was 30 not any of the Kings wives, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dauncing and banquetting, the came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction : and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others of younger yeares and times, this old Queene remembred well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonofor, grandfather to this Balthafar, and kept in mind both his religion and diume gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promifes of reward and honour, to reade and interprete those wordes miraculously written, to whom Daniel made answere in a farre different style from that he yied 30 towards his grandfather: for the cuill which he foretold Nabuchodono for, he wished that the same might befall his enemies, but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these wordes, Keepe thy rewards to thy felse, and give thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing onto the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gaue him first the cause of Gods just judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence; whereof the King and all his Wifemen were vtterly ignorant: Which being written at large in Daziel hath Dan.5. 2.18, this effect, That forgetting Gods goodnesse to his father, whom all Nations feared 19,20. and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprined him of his estate and vnderstanding; so vpon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite 40 power he restored him to both. This King notwithstanding lifted himselfe vp against the same God, and presumed both to abuse those vessels, dedicated to holy vies, and neglecting the Lord of all power, prayled and worthipped the dead Idols of Gold Siluer, Braffe, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those wordes, from the Oracle of a true God deliuered, (to wit) Mene Tekel, Vyhraisin, gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdome, and finished it: That Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. The very euening or night of this day, wherein Balthafar feafted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, 50 whose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no leffe filled with the vapours of wine, than their hearts were with the feare of Gods judgement, he caused all the bankes and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut downe with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates drie for the present, by whose emptie channell, his armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Towne lay buried (as the Poet fayth) in fleepe and wine: fuch as came in the Persians way were put to the sword, valesle they faued themselues by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the streetes with an vncertaine tumult.

Such Affirian Lords as had revolted from Balthafar, and betaken themselves to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Pallace; which having eafily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, flew both him and them without any mercie, who struggled in vaine to keepe those lines which God had newly threatened to take away. And now was the prophecie of teremie fulfilled, and that of Esay two hundred yeres 70,627. before this subucrition, who in his three & fortieth Chapter and elsewhere write h Efa. 6.47. this deliruction to feelingly and linely, as if he had beene prefent both at the terrible flaughter committed, and had feene the great and vnfcared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the forrowes and bewaylings of euerie suruiuing soule thereunto subiect. His prophecie of this place he beginneth in these words: Come downe and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darkenesse, O daugh-20 ter of the Chaldeans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vled Nabuchodonofor and the Chaldeans, to punish the idolatric of the Indaans, yet Efay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not yet forget that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitie. For (fayth E/ay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine in- cap. 47. heritance, and given them into thine hand: thou diddest shew them no mercie, but thou diddelt lay thy very heavie yoake upon the ancient . I will rife up against them, fayth the Isaina, Lord of Hoftes, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the fonne and To wit Enil. the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found shall be stricken through: and meredach and wholoener toyneth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in Ealthafar. 20 peeces before their eyes, their houses spoyled, and their wines ranished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victoric of Cyrus, or that received the re-

were written two hundred yeares before any thing attempted. The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors fet downe, might feeme altogether fabulous: for besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orofius, Ariftotle in the third of his Politikes, the fecond Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the Citic knew not that the rest was taken three dayes after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonic of port from others truly as it was, that could better leaue the same to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in manie places of his prophecies, which

40 Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compaffe thereof at three hundred Diad La. and threefcore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes fine and fortie miles; the walls whereof had so great a breadth, as fixe chariots might passe in front thereon. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitracus, three hundred threescore and fine foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabe in the beginning of his fixteenth Booke of Geographie giues it a greater circuit, adding fiue and twentie furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and fine furlongs, which makes eight and fortie myle and one furlong: but findes the wall farre vnder that which Diodor reports : And so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hun-50 dred cubites; which is also very much: cuerie cubite containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he gives the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus findes a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and fourescore furlongs in circle; the thick-

neffe of the wall he measures at fiftie cubites, and the height at two hundred of the fame regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Braffe, with pofts and hookes to hang them on of the same mettall: and therefore did the Prophet E/ay rightly intitle Babylon The Princesse and glorie of Kingdomes.

But when Cyrus had woon her, he stript her out of her princely Robes, and made her a flane, dividing not onely all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his fouldiors: but beflowing the inhabitants themselves as bondslaves upon those that had taken possession of their goods.

Touching the raigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enioyed in rest and plea- to fure, I can say no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to haue lasted onely seuen yeares: in which time he made such Constitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wife Kings, that are defirous to establish a royall power in themselves and their posteritie.

V I. The end of CYRVS.

He last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written, Herodotus and Instine deliuer, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse Cyrus inuaded the Maffagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tompris their Queene: and that in an incounter betweene the Persians and these Northerne Nomades, Tompris lost her

Armie, and her Sonne Spargarifes, that commaunded it: In revenge whereof, this Queene making new leuies of men of warre, and following the warre against cyrus, in a fecond battaile beat the Persian armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his bodie, and cast the same into a bole of bloud, vsing these wordes; Thou that haft all thy life time thir fled for bloud, now drinke thy fill, and fati- 20 ate thy felfe.

It should hereby seeme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perfuaded to abate their furie by some forcible inuation and depopulation, because in the time of Crawares, father to Allyages, those Serthians inuaded Media and Asia the leffe, and held the same in a seruile subjection eight and twentic yeares.

This warre which Metasthenes calleth Tomprique, lasted (fayth he) fixe yeares, and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeue with Viginer, that this Scythian warre was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the Conquest of Lydia, ac- 40 cording to Ciestas before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliuer the V: prim. part. fuccesse of that warre otherwise than Herodotus doth: The rather (fayth Viginer) because Strabo in his eleventh booke reciteth, That Cyrus surprised the Sacians by the same stratageme by which Instine sayth he defeated the sonne of Tompris. And the same Cteffas also reporteth, That the last warre which Cyrus made was against Amorrhaus, King of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whome though he ouercame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he fuffered three dayes after.

Strab. L.15.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pafagardes, which himselfe had built, and where his Epitaph was to bee read in his time; which is 53 faid to have beene this: O vir quicunque es & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoraui: Ezo fum Cyavs qui Persisimperium constitui, pusillum hoc terra quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne inuideas; O thou man, who soeuer thou art, or whence societ thou commest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldest come: I am CYRVS that founded the Perlian Empire, doe not enuie unto me this little earth, with which my bodie is couered.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon o.curt. L. hope of treasure, supposed to have beene buried with him, or vpon defire to honour his dead bodie with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie > lay, Alexander caused to be coursed with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be fet youn it. Thefethings well confidered, as they give credit to the reports of to Kenophon and Zonaras, so they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his bodic Xim pad 8. in the hands of Tomyris.

And furely, had Cyrus loft the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his some would so some have transported all his remaining forces into Agypt, fo farre off from that quarter: the Seythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Camby/es beene able in fuch haft to have undertaken and performed fo great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleeue xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace : and that finding in himselfe, that hee could not long enjoy the world, hee called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two fonnes, Cambyfes and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he affured himfelfe, and taught others, of the immortalitie of the Soule. and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deferuing of enerie man in this life; he exhorted his fonnes by the strongest arguments he had to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things hee vttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, > when he gouerned Sufa in Persia; and that Cyrus himselfe had read the prophecie of Elar, wherein he was expressely named, and by God (for the deliverie of his people) praordained. Which act of deliuering the Iewes from their Captinitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that ever Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an 30 instrument of Gods power, vsed for the chastising of many Nations, and the establiffing of a Gouernment in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth; which must last for euer, though heaven and earth shall perish.

d. VII.

Of CYRYS his Decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

Auing therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by fundry Historians, the glorie of all which was as a reward of this his fernice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meete at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Raigne, being perhaps the first that euer hee made, after his possession of the Balylonian Empire: That the captine Jewes should return againe into their owne Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Ierusalem, having now endured and finished the threescore and tenne yeares captinitie, by the Pro-50 phets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, he gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessarie and wanting. He also restored vnto them fine thousand foure hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Siluer, whereof Nabuchodonofor, the grandfather of Balthafar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

1.8/d.2. 2.5/d.7. Phil.in bre.

The number of the Ienes, which returned out of Chaldes under their leader Zorobabel, the sonne of Salathiel, and nephew to King Jeconius, and Jefus or Josus the fonne of Iofadak, were about fiftie thousand; where, as soone as they arrived, they built an Altar to the liuing God, and factificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselues how to prepare materials for the rebuilof Lantain ding of the Temple.

But no fooner did the Iewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritanes and other idolatrous Nations adioyning gaue all the impediment they could. So did the Gouernours of those Provinces vnder Cyrus altogether countenance the diffurbers, and in no fort fauoured the Iewes, nor the labours and purpofes they had in 10

Efd. 16.2. v.16. hand. And not onely those which were but Provinciall Lieutenants and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyses himselfe; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was bushed otherwise, countermaunded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt, that what soeuer Camby ses did when himfelse had obtained the Empire, yet during the life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition : They may herein refolue themselues out of Esdras, That

Efd.1.4.5.0.53. by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations the building was hindered all the Effice 41.5 time of King Cyrus life &c. And therefore it is true, that the Jewes themselves affirme, as it is written in the second of John, That the Temple was fixe and fortie yeares in fetting vp, hauing received fo many hinderances from the first foundation 10 to the second of Darius.

And if wee fecke the naturall and politique causes which moued Cambyses to withfiend his fathers decree, as well while he gouerned under him, as when himselse became sole and sourraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembred by Esdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Councellors in Phanicia, wherein they complaine, that the Iewes were enermore rebeilious and troublers of Kings, that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that 20 Camby[es, having it in his refolution to invade Agyps, and that it was a common opinion, That the Iewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence under Asoles, when they conquered Indea; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and give the same disturbance to Cambyfes Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Wabuchodonofor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezekie', Egypt was the confidence of the house of Is-

Ezek. c.29.

But it is to be understood, as Codoman and others have observed, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Councellors & Gouernors of Phonicia complained against the Ieves, did not præcede, but fucceed Darius Hystaspes, as in the fixt and seventh chapters of 40 Esdras it is made plaine: and also that those Gouernors (whose Epistle sheweth as much) did not withstand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclofing of the Citic, as by the reasons given in the said Epistle, and by the Kings anfwere, it is euident.

Also in the fixt of Ezra, the foureteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finished it (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Ifrach, and by the commandement of CYRVS and DARIVS, and ARTAHSHASTE King of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenteenth of Ezra it is written; Now after these things, in the raigne of ARTAH-SHASTE King of Persa: which was as much to say as after the finishing of the 50 Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Eldras is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hirrufalem. Which action, though prospered by the hand of God, was very slowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrm. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of gouernment, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldest sonne Cambyses, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his younger sonne to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadufia, and then died, after he had raigned (fayth Herodotus) one and thirtie yeares, or (according to Iustine) but thirtie.

CHAP.3. S.8.

Y R v s had iffue two fonnes, Camby fes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atolfa, Meroe, and Artyftons: Ctefius addeth to these, Amytis. Atofa and Meroe their brother Camby fes married; Artyftona, Darius Hystaspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead: who (as forme Writers have supposed) inflamed both her husband Dariu, and Nerves after him, to inuade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell 20 intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Macadonian) had against the lewes, though the opinion of Iosephus be more probable, who findes Aman to be an Amalekite . But it is hard to be vnderstood, how Alosa, the daughter of Cyrus, should have beene Efther; whose Historic seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The defire of Atoffa to have Greece brought under the yoake of Perfit, was partly grounded vpon the honour which thereby shee thought her husband might obtaine, partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corynthians, Athenia ans, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women: Wherefore I cannot give affent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the necre found of the two names, 30 Atoffa and Hadaffa (by the later of which Efther was also called) makes them to haue beene one person. For though it be true, that Efther concealing her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Ladie; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that the should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Esther did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Histories could not be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobilitie, must needs have vnderstood the truth: who neverthelesse did so well know the parentage of Atoffa, that for her fake, as being daughter of

Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a verie weake clayme. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place,

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeares added make in all an hundred ninetic and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Affuerus for the immediate fuccessor of Cyrus; in place (fayth Melansthon) of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melanethon conicetureth, doth not account Camby fes in the Catalogue, because his 20 raigne was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a fecond opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus have also a differing account from the Greekes; whom nevertheleffe Eufebius and most of the Latines follow. And so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account: For in this fort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their raignes.

But to proceede. Eulebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of euery Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad: As the war of Altyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Cracfus his Father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus raigne to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The invalion of Agypt by Camby les to the third yeare of the threefcore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement betweene feuerall formes of computation adde the more cre-

Againe, this historicall demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomicall com- protion Almag. putation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. lib.3. cap.8. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure and twentith yeare after Nabonassar. And the Era of Nabonassar beganne on the fixe and twentieth of Februarie; which conferred with the Olvmpiad, was in the nint. Moneth of the first yeare of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accompt of the Olympiads, as doe the Greeke Historians, or that of Nabonassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation.

40 For Ptolomiereckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twentie Iulian yeares, and an hundred and fortie daies from Nabonassar, to the sixteenth of Islie in the feuenth yeare of Cambyfes.

The Greekes, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Agypt by Cambyles in the second or third yeare of the threescore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyfes feuenth years in the first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad runnes along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolo-50 mie the two hundred and fixe and fortieth of Nahonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars Araand the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeares) it agrees with the third of the threescore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iofephas agrees with the Greekes throughout, fauing that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyavares, with Cyrus, in the destruction 10 caused his owners be of Babylon, which is true, and not contrarie to the Greeke computation, but may very well fland with it.

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearled, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordethalso with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

Of CAMBYSES, and the conquering of Agypt by him.

E will therefore according to the truth give the Empire of Persia to Cambyles, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all thinges, saving the delire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof hee was possest in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North, Ctehis with others give him a longer raigne than agreeth with the Grecian accompt before received.

In the fifth yeare of his fole raigne, and in the third yeare of the threefcore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having 20 ouerthrowne the King thereof, Pfammenitus, he not only caused him to bee slaine. Heads, pages, but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his

Herodotus and Ctestus give for cause of this Warre (being no other indeede than the Ambition of Camby/es) that when he sent to Amasis King of Agypt, to have his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessour, which Camby fes disdained.

Howfocuer it were; true it is, that Cambyfes gathered an Armie fit for fuch an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasis died and lett Pfammenitus, whom Ctefius calleth Amyrtaus, his fucceffour; who in- 30 ioyed Agypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but fixe Moneths, though other Chronologers give him fixe yeares.

But how long soeuer he held the Crowne, in one battaile he lost it, and was himselfe taken prisoner.

It is faid that Camby fes following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that hee also trusted him with the gouernement of euer confume Egypt, and that vpon some reuolt, or the suspition thereof, hee caused him to bee flaughtered. But the race of this King was not fo extirpated, if wee may beleeve Herodoius and Thucydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who caused the Agyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxarxes.

That Pfammenitus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Atrasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrivall, that hee caused his body to bee drawne out of the graue, and after divers indignities vsed, commanded the same to Law called Taisans, or like bee burnt, contrarie to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the for like, be-cause himselfe Egyptians vsed to powder their dead bodies with falt, and other drugges, to the had vincombed end the wormes might not deuoure them. The *Persians durst not consume the carkaffe of them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore seared to seedeit after his death with Carrion.

The rest of CAMBYSES his acts.

Fter this victorie obtained in Agypt, Camby fes fent an Armie into Cyprus, and constrained Euelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Agyptians.

While Cambyfes yet bufied himfelfe in Egypt, he fo much detefted the Idolatrie of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with to the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to bee torne downe and defaced. That done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-turne the Temple of Impiter Ammon; but the Deuill in defence of his Oratorie raised such a tempest of Streb, or In Japiter Ammon; but the Deunt in defence of in Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Countrey is couered, as the Persians were 1.1.

Notwithstanding which misaducnture, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disday- Har.13. Sen.1.3 ning to be refifted, he prepared the rest of his Armie, which himselfe meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-fent troupe had tried, hee changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the Elements doe not obay them, according to 20 that old English prouerbe, Goe faith the King, flay faith the Tide.

After his returne from the attempt of Athiopia, hee caused Apis the Agyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be flaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and beene executed as in seruice of him that only is, and liueth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did fit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) hee gaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murther Smerdis his brother. And having married his owne fifters, contrarie to the Perlian Lawes, hee committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder upon the one of them, called Merce, then by himselfe with child, because shee bewailed the death

30 ofher brother Smerdis. I finde it written of this Cambyfes, That because his Prede- Her. psg. 89.90. ceffors observed religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he affembled his Judges and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marrie his owne fifter : it being his owne intent fo to doc. The Judges (who had alwaies either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfie Kings and times) made answere, that there was not any thing written allowing any such coniunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was alwaies left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselves; and fo, as Nauclerus termes it, inuenerunt occasionem: That is as much to fay, as the Judges found a thift to pleafe the King, and to fecure themselues. And yet, where it con-40 cerned not the Kings private latisfaction, he caused Sisamnus one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which fauoured his incestuous match, to bee flaied a-live for an vniust judgement given, and the same his hide to bee hung vp ouer the judgement feate. After which bestowing the fathers Office on his sonne, he willed him to remember, that the same partialitie descrued the same punishment.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the some of his beloued Praxalbes was very strange and vngratefull. For when he defired to bee truely informed by him what the Perlians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; only it was by many observed that hee tooke more than vsuall delight in the tast of Wine. With 50 which taxation inflamed, hee yied this replication: And are the Perstans double tongued, who also rell me that I have in all thinges excelled inv Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes shalt then witnesse, whether in this report they have done meeright : for if at the first shot I pierce thy somes heart with an arrow, then is it false that hath beene spoken; but if I misse the marke, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, and my subjects beleeved. This being spoken, he directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling dead with the stroke, Camby fes commanded his bodie to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly reloycing, thewed it to the Father with this faying, in stead of an Epitaph: Now PRAXASPES thou maiest resolve thy selfethat I have not lost my wits with Wine. but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous crucities hee exercifed, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de foy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi, (Cedrensis writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdias) Ministers of his domesticall affaires, taking advantage of the great refemblance betweene to Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possest them selves of the Empire, hee made all hast towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horse-backe, his fword dif-theathing pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedileffe repentance of the flaughter which hee had executed voon his owne brother, he soone after gaue vp his wicked ghost, when hee had raigned eight yeares, accounting therein those seuen Moneths in which the Mist goulened, while he was abfent.

In Carriby fes the Maie line of Cyrus failed. For he had no iffue either by Atolla or Zonaras com.3. Citeroe : yet Conaras Gut of Hierome gives him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a fonne called Grenies, who being drowned in the River ophites by Antioch, the fame 10 was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes.

He built the Citic of B. bylen in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly feated, and that of Merce in the Hand of Nilw, calling it by the name of his fifter Meroe.

Y Rvs and his two fonnes being now dead, and the Kinedomein the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provinciall Governours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyfus, Asphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian King, having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joyned their forces together, surprifed and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and affistants. In which action (facth Listine) Interphernes and Afphalines were flaine; but Herodotus otherwile, that they were only wounded, for he auoweth, that all the feuen Princes were 40 present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouernour, these Princes grew into confultation how the same might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the seuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by iust lawes defend their libertie in equalitie, giving divers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Camby ses; As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it selfe, euen in good men, doth often infect the minde with many vices, and the libertic and freedome in all things is most apt to insult, & to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Againe, that tyrants do commonly vie the services of wicked men, and fauour 50 them most, they vsurpe vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens wines by force, and destroy whom they please without judgement.

Magazinzus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all thinges without judgment runne into bulinesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer-bearing flouds.

He therefore thought it fafelt to make election of a few, and those of the best, wifelt, and most vertuous; because it is ouer found that excellent Counsailes are ouer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third judgement, who perfuaded the creation of a King, because euen among few diuturnitie of concord is feldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the discord of many Rulers hath inforst the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, faith Darins, farre fafer to observe the Lawes of our Countrie, by which Kingly gouernement hath beene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall gouernement by God established, and made prosperous. And to avoide partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following these seven Princes should mount on Horse-back, and on him the Kingdome should be conferred, whose horse after the Sunne-riling should first ney or bray. Whereupon the o-20 ther fixe Princes descended from their horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the feuen Princes, whereof Darius himselfe was one, that delivered the Empire from the vsurpation of the Magi, hee divided the whole into seven governments; Herodotus faith into twentie Satrapies.

Of DARIVS his government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

ARIVS deuised equall lawes whereby all his subjects might beegouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaue accesse to all his fubicets, and behaued him felfe fo mildly to all men that many Nations desired and offered themselues to become his Vasfalls: Only hee laied divers paiments and taxes on the people, which had not been accustomed in Cyrus time, to the valew of foureteene thousand fine hundred and threefcore talents, faith Herodotus.

The warre which Cambyles made a farre off in Leypt, and the contention betweene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Bibylomians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoke, whereof Darius be- 10 ing aduertifed, he prepared an Armie to recouer that Citie and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult works, he yied the service of Zopirus, who for the louche bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nofe, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flie to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the crueltie of Darius: who, for having given him advice to give over the fiege of their - Citie, had in this fort difmembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces; which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouer-throwes given to the Persians vpon sallies, hee delivered the Citic into Darius his handes, who had lyen before it twentie Moneths.

Of DARIVS his favour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

M the second yeare of Darius, hee gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierufalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his owne charge, and out of the reuennues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouernours of those Provinces which are 50 situate betweene Euphrates, and the Phanician, and midland Sea, (whom Exra calleth the Captaines beyond the River) had hindred the worke in Cambyfes his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thence-forth come neare vnto Ierusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselves, and get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, procul recedite ab illis; With-draw your selucs farre from them; In our English, Be yee farre from thence, to wit, from the Citic, and Temple, now in building.

Hee also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subjects, That who socuer Est. 6.11. should thence forth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the Timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwell there, (to) destroy all Kings and People that put to their hands to alter. and to destroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, Go. In foure yeares after which decree (the Jewes being really furnished with money and all thinges necessarie from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the fixth yeare of Darins Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne. Of DARIVS his Scythian Warre.

Fter the recouerie of Babylon hee inuaded the Soythians, whose King Holla. Iustine calleth Lauthinus; and faith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre 14st. 12. against him, because heerefused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, hee built a Bridge of small Vessells ouer the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custodie of the fame in charge (among others of Asia the leffe) to the Ionians and Aolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Gracians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Darius might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was relisted by Hiftieus Prince of Milet, . a Citie of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greekes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrie, because they in yned themselves to Darius. But the Seythians Died.l.t.

30 more elegantly termed them good flaues, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as faire an occasion of libertie as could have beene defired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the defart Countrie called Beffarabia, found in it neither people to refift them, nor any fustenance to relieue them. For the Soythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vsing the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grasiers, driving their Heards from one place to another as opportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggons wherein they carried their wines and children. These Wag-40 gons they place at enery Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remoueable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such an Agora, -(as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, victualls to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either hee himselfe might make vse of, or by destroying it might gricue his enemies; he beganne to perceive his owne folly, and the danger into which it had brought him. Yet setting a good face vpon a badde game, he fent braue messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and ei-50 ther to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile, Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeeld by faire meanes, and become his Subject giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe that all

Dariss interpreting by his owne wish, thought that hee did yeeld all the Elements wherein those creatures liue, and his weapons withall into his handes. But Gobryas one of the feuen Princes who had flaine the Magi, construed their meaning a-right, which was thus; O yee Persians, get yee wings like Birds, or dine under the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for elle yee Shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Seythians themselves, who assauled the Persian camp, draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexing the Armie with continual Alarums day and night, were so fearclesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and euen in his fight, they did not for beare the pastime of courling a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnessed to theirs Darius was so discouraged that he for sooke his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were ficke and weake behinde him, and so with all speede marched away towards the River 1ster. Hee was pursued hardly by the Seythians, who mist him, yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the lonians to depart, affuring them that the Persian King should never more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which wordes had certainely beene proued true, had not Hyflians the Milesian prevailed with his per ple, to attend the comming of Darins, whom the Scythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Isterto fecke him out.

8. VI.

The first occasion of the Warre which DARIVS made upon Greece, with a rehear (all of the government in Athens, whence the anarrell grew.

Ow the better to understand the reason and motiues of that great Warre, which followed foone after, betweene the Persians and Gr.ecians, it is necessarie to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie indured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius invasion on that fide the Sea with admirable fuccesse. Neither doe I hold it any impertinencie, to be large in vnfolding enery circumstance of so great a busineffe, as gaue fire to those warres, which neuer could be throughly quenched, untill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot confumed with a slame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Albens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being alreadie set downe, though scatteringly, and in severall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrents of the Eailerne Emperors, and the Kings of Judea; fo I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember agains the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedamonians they maintained still their ancient policie under Kings, though these also after some fifteene descents bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the fafetie of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthie to fucceede him) they changed their former gouernement from Mo-30 narchicall to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the sonne of Coarus was the first, after whom they were called Medontida; and of these there were twelve Generations belides Meden, to wit.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisedome, gaue lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth yeare of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after-ages derined vito the Romanes, and by the Desem-viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelve Ta- 10 bles, which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne daies violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practife and maintenance of a popular gouernement; the estate of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisse fratus the sonne of Euppocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions whereof Alegacles and Lyeurgus two Citizens of noble Families were becomethe heads, tooke occasion by their contention and insolencie to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plaufible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Hauing by this meanes obtained loue and credit, he wounded himselfe, and faining that by malice of his enemies he had like to have 30 beene flaine for his loue to the good Citizens, he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadell of Athens, hee made himselse Lord of the Towne; Hegessstratus being then Gouernour. Butthe Citizens who in enery change of gouernement had fought to remoue themselues further and further from the forme of a Monarchie, could so ill brooke this vsurpation of Pifffratus, that he was driven for lack of helpe to fliethe Towne, as soone as Megacles and Lycargus joyning their forces attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyrannie founded upon the diffention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; fo was it foone after well reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megales found the power of Lyargus to grow 40 greater than his owne, he did (as is the viuall practife of the weaker fide) call in the common enemie Fisitratus, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Familie of the Alemaonida, whereof Megales was chiefe, became very powerfull, vet fo that Pifffratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alemsonids, and especially Megasles being incenfed against Pifistratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practifed with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their Wintercore they practice with the confidence of the 1 owner, proceeding their intent, perceined no other remedie for his affaires than to with-draw himfelfe to Eretria, where hee remained eleuen yeares. Which time being expired, having hired 50 Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, hee againe recoursed the principalitie of Athens: after which third obtaining his effate, hee gouerned Athens seuentcene Heracula apid veares, according to Ariffolle, and raigned in all thirtie and three yeares, faith Elianus, but as Instine hath it foure and thirtie, accounting the time belike as well

chus, who gouerned the Athenians with fuch moderation, as they rather feemed the Lineall successours of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and fome three yeares before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Ariftogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thueidides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnnaturall luft after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled 10 Hopparchus, doth greatly magnific him, affirming that hee was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that fcandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, first sought to discouer the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton; by a Harlot of theirs called Lemnia: who because shee would not reueale her Companions, did cut out her ownetongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a firait amitie with Antides, Tyrant of the Citic Lamplacus, whom hee knew to bee Lamplacus acie greatly fauoured by Darius, to whose Sonne Hipochus hee gaue one of his Daugh- woof safety ters in marriage. But some three yeares after the death of his brother, doubting pen the Helle 20 I know not what strong practise against himselfe, hee beganne to viethe Citizens Harks, with great seucritic, which neither Pififrains the Father, nor Hippins himselfe had Thuidis. euer exercifed during their vsurpations till this time. And therefore the Ashenians fearing least that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippist, they flirred vp Clistines one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practise their deliuerie: who calling to his affiftance the banished Alemenida, together with an Armic of the Lacedemonians, ledde by Cleomenes their King, fo affrighted Hippias, as by composition bee gaue ouer his estate, and the possession of Aibens, and from thence imbarking himselfe tooke land at * Sigeum, whence hee went to Lampfacus * Citema pro-

Hee was deprimented on 20 ued of his chate, as Herodotus and Thusidides agree, twentie yeares before place to the life of tendos, the battle of Marathon : all which time he continued, partly with Lantides, at which drift is other times with Actaphernes Lieutenant for Darius in Sardis, the Metropolis of Animal, calls Lydia; perswading and practising the enterprise vpon Athens, which Darius in the premontethe end to his great dilhonour vnder-tooke, twentie yeares after Hippias had religned his estate.

Thus farre I have digressed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceiue the better the causes and motiues of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to bee restored to Athens by the helpe of Darius, which made him solicite and perswade the Persians to conquer Greece, was one; but not the most

Cyrus, and left as hereditarie Scruants to the Crowne of Perlia. But as it is the custome of all Nations halfe conquered (witnesse Ireland) to rebellagaine vpon euery aduantage and opportunitie: fo did the Ionians, and other Gracians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all meanes possible to free

At this time they found such men readie to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian beene given vnto them for bridles, to hold them in subjection. Every one of those Townes had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the government of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Perlian, by whose only might they held the people in subjection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremitie, they vsed all meanes to deliver him and his Armie (that otherwise had beene loft) out of the Soythians hand. Of this great peece of service Hisliam the Tyrant of Myletm expected the chiefe thankes, as having beene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius, when the rest, either perswaded by the Seythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were readie to have abandoned him. But it came so to passe that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Hiftieus (being powerfull and craftie) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had alreadie received at his hand, found meanes to carrie him a-long to Sufa, where hee detayned him with all kinde viage of a friend, yet kept fuch good espiall vpon him, as an enemie, 20 hee could not flart away. Hiftiam had fubtiltie enough to discouer the Kings purpose, which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, hauing a small Territorie, than to fit and feast at the great Kings table, and heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was menaged; being himfelfe an idle beholder, and enioying with much restraint of libertie, none other pleasures than a private man might bestow vpon himselfe.

Wherefore he bethought himselfe of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacifie which if he might be fent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either 30 fatisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resoluing upon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputie at Miletus, aduifing him to ftirre vp fome Rebellion. These directions came feafonably to Ariflagoras, who having failed in an enterprife vpon the Isle of Navos, through the faile dealing of a Persian his Associate, stood in feare of difgrace, if not of some further ill that might befall him, as one that had wasted the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counfaile: and the better to draw the whole Countrie of Ionia into the same course, which he determined to runne, hee abandoned his tyrannie, and did fet Miletus at libertie. This plaufible beginning wanne 40 vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke and fold as flaues to their citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to bee at his command. The Persian fleet, whereof hee lately had beene Admirall in the enterprise of Maxos, hee had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers, and Captaines; fo that now he thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his neck, and crush both him and his affistants to peeces, valesse that he were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field, which the Ionians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a journey to Sparta, where having affaied in vaine 50 with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedamonians: hee went from thence to Athens, and with better succoffe befought the people to lend him their affistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had beene fent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Asia, defiring them not to give countenance to Hippins, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answeres, having found verie churlish entertainement. So that the euill which they were to expect in all likelyhood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their confanguinitie with the Ionians, and the persuasions of Aristagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twentie thippes the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Erstrians added fine more, in regard of ancient kindnesse that had passed betweene the lonians and them. With these and their owne forces joyned, the Ionians entred the River Caiffrus, which falleth into to the Sea by Ephefus: by which advantage they surprised Sardis when no enemie was heard of or suspected; infomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of fafetie, than by retreating himfelfe into the Castle, which the Gracians could not force: from whence he beheld the flaughter of the Citizens. and the Citie flaming.

The Persians at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recouered the Market place, strengthened by the River Pactolus, which ranne through it, and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well aduiting themselves, made all the hast they could toward the Sea side . But Artaphernes having gathered all the 20 strength he could, pursued the Gracians, and found them neere Ephelius; where setting resolucedly vpon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Armie; the rest sauing themselves in Ephesus. In this fight Engleides, Captaine of the Eratrians, perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserved. After this ouerthrow, the Athenians, which were fent to Ariftagoras and to the Ismians, could by no arguments of theirs, no, not by their teares, be perfuaded to make any second triall of their fortunes, on that side the Sea.

CHAP.5. $.7.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyfe in the world, than the good fucceffe which the Persians had in one or two skirmilhes, could rayle. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, woon a great part of Caria; and fending their Fleet into go the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands . Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to give them aid by fea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes comming to the care of Darius, filled him with great indignation. and with an extreame hatred of the Athenians, upon whome hee vowed to take sharpe reuenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not have dared to attempt such things, but by the infligation of those, to whom their ignorance of his great might had affoorded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the 40 Warre commenced by Darius, and purfued by Xerxes against Athens: To which, the folicitation of Hipping, before remembred, gaue onely fome forme and affiftance: the bufineffe, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like youngh to have proceeded, though he had perished ere it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour : the Ilanders moreouer did helpe to furnish out a Nauie of three hundred and sixtic sayle against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a desire to abate their pride, than any seare of harme that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but

50 by surprise In cuerie fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their auncient Captaines. In one fea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the upper hand; but they were Phanicians, Agyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquilhed: neither was that victorie of any vie to them; the Cyprians, in whose aid they came, being vtterly beaten by the Perfian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old fub-jection. So had the Perfians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battailes, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Townes upon Hellefont, with some Eolian and Ionian Cities: when Ariflagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, defirous to feat himselfe in Amphipois, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike hee landed, ouerthrew him, and cut his troupes in pieces.

About the same time, Hiftieus the first mouer of this insurrection came downeinto those quarters; who having vndertaken the performance of great matters to

Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whome his double-dealing was 10

But this cuasion preserved him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, least the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seemes that hee would have done, by the buriall which he commaunded to be given to his dead bodie that was crucified, and by his heavie taking of his death.

Histian had fought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his condition, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselues, without his helpe. The firength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withflood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promifed vnto them the libertie of 20 an open sea, emboldened them to trie the vttermost, when very few friends were left vpon that Continent to take their part. But their Navie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forfaking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse slight of those that should have assisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being affaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens flaine, their wives and children made flaves, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whome for fixe yeares space they had put to so much trouble.

His warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe fide with variable fuccesse: Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the warre but against the Athenians and Eritreans, who jointly make the warre but against time. Attenuars and with auto, now by 40 affisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia, did now by 40 affisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia, did now by 40 affisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia, and in Lydia his embassadours demaund an acknowledgement from them all: among whome, some of them not so well resolued as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Eginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed (by the affishance of the Laced emonians ) after divers encounters forft them to give pledges, and to relinquish and Marrow; the partie of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedamonians in this warre, and caused but those bor his companion-King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civile warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of thippes fit to transport his Armie over the Hellesport: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse. The charge in chiefe of his Ar- 50 mie he committed to Datis, accompanied and affisted by Hippias, the sonne of Pisse firatus, expelled out of Athens twentie yeares before, and by Ataphernes his brother, um, not farre Gouernour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commaunders hauing their Companies brought downe to the Sea-side, imbarked themselues in six hundred Gailies and other Vessels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Cjelades, which lay in the mid-way betweene Afathe leffe, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces ouer the Agean Sea; but on the contrarie they might alwayes both relieue themselues in their pallage, and shrowd themselues from all studdaine tempests and

To this end they first possess themselves of Samos, secondly they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was natine: Which Island Dariss did not 10 onely forbeare to facke, but recalling the inhabitants, begaue order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice, to Ajollo creeted. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubera: for that Citic 10 Horad. (asalreadie hath beene shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians tooke ground, and besieged Eretria verie straitly, and after fixe dayes affault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphabus and Philagius, they tooke it, fackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus farre the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Eubers the Persians past their Armie into Actice, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where 20 they landed towards Athens.

The Athenians finding the time arrived, wherein they were to dispute with their owne vertue against Fortune, and to cast lots for their libertie, for their wines, their children, and their lives, put themselves in the best order they could to make reliflance, and withall fent away with speed to the Lacedamonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Diuell, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victorie, promising that some one of the Gods should be present at the battaile to affift them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne seeing he could not bring with him any present succours 30 from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the Gods, and promife of affistance from Heauen, which no doubt (though the deuice was likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages haue beene more stirred vp with tond Prophecies and other like superiti-tious fooleries, than by any just cause or solide reason. The Athenians being now left to themselues, with one thousand onely of the Plat.cans (who having beene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremitie witnesse their thankefulnesse and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their aduantage to defend the wals of Athens, or to put themselues into the field with fuch forces as they had, the fame confifting of tenne thousand Athenians, 40 and one thousand of the Plateans. In the end, and after great diversitie of opinions, Militades, who perfuaded the triall by battaile, preuailed. The Armies being now in view, and within a myle of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troupes: two wings or hornes, as they tearme them, and the bodie of a battaile. The Perstans, when they perceived so small a Troope advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposses of their understanding, than posses with the resolution whereof they made shew. So invincible and resistlesse the Perstans effected their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victorie being doubtfully ballanced for a while, fometime the vertue of the Greei-

50 ans, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailing, the Gracians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered and put in ront; the Athenians following their victorie euen to the Sca-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, faued themselues in their shippes.

The Persian Armie consisted of an hundred thousand foot and tenne thousand horse, of which there were slaine in the place fixe thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourescore and twelue. For howsoeuer it came to passe, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Panci terrores, or by some other affright, it seemeth, that the inuading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backes towards their enemie, and loft that number, by Herodotus let downe, in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for Infines report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armic were slaine, the fame hath no apparance nor possibilitie of truth. RXES received from his father, as hereditarie, double Warre; one to be made against the Agrptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians; of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the fucceffe ridiculous. In the confultation for the profecution of this Warre, which was chiefely bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commaunded in Thrace and Mace lan, under Darius, and had also Hyfraspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his fifter A tozostres, persuaded by many arguments the Europeus warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrarie counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late invalions, which Darius had made contrarie to his counfell: The one in person vpon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants vpon the Greekes; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

He therefore befought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himselse in this businesse. For what socuer undertaking hath deliberate and found counfell for conductor, though the fuccesse doe not alwayes answere the probabilitie, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variablenesse of her owne nature, which only the druine Prouidence and not any humane power, can constraine.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Aerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrified by Vilions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred which he made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) affisted the Gracian Expedition with all the An power he had.

After the Warre of Agypt was ended, foure yeares were confumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inualion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeene hundred thousand foot, Mar. 17. and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for -Carriage, if we may believe Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the number leffe by feuen hundred thousand footmen.

The Commaunders of the feuerall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commaundements of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of 50 their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryasby a lifter of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Aernes his neerest kindred, as Generals ouer all; fauing that the charge of tenne thousand select Perfians, called the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died

the first encounter, were Callimachus and Steileus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, layd hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which being also deprised, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeare of the threescore and 20 twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the Warre made by Coriolanus against his

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the leffer Asia, Militades sought and obtained an imployment against the Ilanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and paffing ouer his Companies in threescore and tenne Gallies, after fixe and twentie dayes affault he brake his thigh, in feeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forget- 30 ting all his seruices past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perfuation of Xuntippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weake and wounded bodie being not able to endure the one, nor his cleate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better fort to each other, with their private Factions, affilted by the vnthankfull and witleffe people, brought them, not many yeares after, from a victorious and famous Nation to base subjection and slauerie. Militades left behind him one some called Cymon, begotten on Hegisipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (fayth Platareh) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to 40 Themistoc'es in understanding, but exceeded them both in justice and good go-

Now Darres taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than forrow for the losse received in Greess, gaue order for new leuies of men, and all other warlike prouisions. But the Azyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and reuenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the reinualion of Greece. The differtion also among his sonnes; of whom, the yonger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Aiossa, disdained to give place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations 50 and enterprises, and joyned him to the earth of his auncestors, about a yeare after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had raigned fixe and thirtie yeres. He left behind him fiue sonnes, namely Artabasanes, born before he obtained the kingdome, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Agypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

or well flaine, there was another prefently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydries; the eightic thousand horsemen were led by the some sof Datis, who commanded the late Armic of Datis in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were two thousand two hundred and eight, surnished by the Phamistuss, who had Commaunders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotic, Chitains, Paphilians, Lyzians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æbians, and Hellespoinins; who were trusted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commaunded by the Princes of Payin, as by Ariabigues the sone of Davius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transfortation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies surnished by Artemisa, the daughter of Lygdames, Princesse of Halycarasssum, and the slands adioyning, which her selfe commaunded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xexes himselse was imbarked.

ð. I I.

XERNES Armic entertained by PYTHIVS: His cutting off Mount Atho; from the Continent: his bridge of Bostes oner the Helespont: and the discourse between him and ARTABANYS upon the view of his Armic.

Hen this world of an Armie was throughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded to make their Rendez-vous and repaire at Surdii in Lydis. And when hee had assembled to the number of seuenteene hundred thousand soot, as he entred the bodie of Celanus, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flockes and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feathended, he allo prefented him with two thousand Talents of Siluer, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting seuen thousand of the Persian Daries, which make so many of our markes.

The King ouercome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only refule his treasure offered, but commaunded that seven thousand Duris should be given him to make vp his foure Millions; of which, to many thousands were wanting when he made the present. But soone after, when Pythius belought him to spare one of his sine sonnes from his attendance into Greece (because himselse was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne sonne) Nerves most barbarously caused the young man, for whome his father sought exemption, to be fundered into two parts, commaunding, that the one halfe of his carkasse should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea fide. The one was a paffage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the fame (with the halfe filland or Headland, whereon it flood) to be an entire Illand, fundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, befides the Mountaine and the Charfone-(wwo reckeef Land it felfe: a worke of more oftentation than of v(x, and yet an enterprife of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent hauing but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to paffe in from. The Cities fo feuered from the maine, were Dion, Olephysus, Assothoon, Thyfius, and Clovas.

He alfogane order, that a Bridge vpon Boats should be made ouer the Hellssport 50 between Abidus and Seslas, the Sea there having a myle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the shifthing, was by a Tempest torne assunder and disserted; wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commaunded those to be slaine that were masters of the worke, and caused fixe hundred threefcore and foureteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and indufric of the Phaneams was fo weil anchored to relift both windes blowing into and from the Easiam Sea, as the fame being well boorded and rayled, the whole Armic of feuenteene hundred thou fand foot, and four efcore thou fand Horfe, with all the Moyles and Carriages, palt were it into Europe in feuen daies and feuen nights, without intermiffion. This transfortation of Armies did Cafar afterward vie. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Arexes his Bridge, did hall the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neere to the Sea side, Xerxes tooke 10 a view of all his Troupes affembled in the Plaines of Abians, being carried up and feated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoyning: and after he had gloried in his owne happineffe, to behold and commaund so many Nations, and fo powerfull an Armie and Fleet, he fuddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeares there should not any one furnine of that maruellous multitude: the cause of which fudden change of passion when he vttered to Artabanus his vncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troupe within that number of yeares by the King remembred, is, That the life it selfe which we enjoy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few dayes given vs in the world, there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that cuer found himfelfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himselfe better with the desire and hope of death than of living the incident calamities, discases, and sorrowes whereto mankind is subject, being so many and ineuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouerlong; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest but in desired death

With this melancholie discourse Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those joyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the 30 inuation of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good fucceffe? Artabanus notwithstanding that he affured himselfe of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yethe told the King, That there were two things which maruelloufly affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most aduerse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet: infomuch, as if any tempest should arise, all 40 the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Hauens thereof affoord them any fafetie: and therefore when fuch thelter shall be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremitie men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemie, by how much the vnfatiate defire of man to obtaine more and more thereof, doth lead him forward : for were there no man found to give relitance, yet the want of meanes to feed fuch an Armie, and the Famine, which cannot be preuented, will without any other violence offered disinable and confume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Aernes, not during perchance 50 to veter what indeed he most feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed. These Caurions were exceeding weightie, if Aerxes his obstinacie had not misprised them. For to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any partie, may better fit a Prince prefuming on his fortune, than enriched with vnLib. 3.

derfianding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second vpon England in the yeare 1588, who had belike neuer heard of this Counfell of Artabanus to Nerves.

The third Booke of the first part CHAP. 6. 8.2.

Now concerning the fecond point, it was very likely, that Xernes his Armie, which could not have leffe in it than two millions of Soules, belides his beafts for Seruice and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vsing Machianels words, Mourne lans confice; die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, frait, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (belides what ferued themselves) for twentic hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertaine but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall 10 what soener they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may beleeve Herodotus, the Armie of Aerxes, being reviewed at Thermopyla, confifted of five millions. * two hundred eightic three thousand two hundred twentie men, besides Laundresfes, Harlots, and Horfes, and was therefore likely to endure a speedie famine.

The effect of Aernes his answere was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that who focuer should enterprise any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconveniences, hee should never pursue the same farther than the dispute and consultation; which if his predecesfors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never growne to that greatnesse, or posfest so many Kingdomes and Nations as they now did, and therefore concluded, 20 That great enterprises were neuer vndertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessitie had enforst him to that warre. But feeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he alreadie commaunded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperitie of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the reft of Nerves Dominions (of whose resolution his father Darius had made a deere experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation, and the fuccesse and end agreeable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owner judgement not sufficient (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace 30 and Atseedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and refolution, whome he conducted. For it is wifely faid of those vncountable multitudes: T Non vires habent sed pondus, & impedimenta potius sunt quam auxilium; They are great in bulke, but weake in force, and rather a luggage than an aid.

Belides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Armie, so the divers Nations, speaking divers Languages, bred the same confusion among the Perfian Commaunders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his fiue millions compounded tenne Armies of fiftie thousand chosen souldiors in each, and sent them yearely into 40 Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either preuailed by the sword, or forst them to for fake their territoric, or brought them in obedience by necessitic and famine, which cannot be refifted. But while Xerves refolued to cut downe the bankes of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceined both in his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom he imployed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Alia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintred in Theffalie, and led by Mardonius, who perfuaded the Enterprise, was in the Summer following vtterly defeated, and himfelfe flaine.

Of the fights at Thermopyla and Artemisium.

Fter fuch time as Xernes had transported his Armie ouer the Hellefont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage alongst that Coast, and how the River of Liffus was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Piffyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake of the encoun-

to ters he had, and the shamefull and incredible overthrowes which he received : As first at Thermopyla, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying betweene the Mountaines which divide The false from Greece, where fometime the Phocians had rayled a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedemonians, affifted with one thousand Tegenta and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnessans, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole, besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thelbians, and all the forces (fuch as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the paffage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the 30 Greekes appeared to excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight Xerxes is faid to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had vtterly despifed; and when the fecond dayes attempt upon the Greekes had proued vaine, hee was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might have continued. had not a run-agate Grecian taught him a fecret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of Mountaines, and set vpon the backes of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedamonians, with his three hundred, and seuen hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, 20 refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely relift that world of men which charged them on all fides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that X they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes having loft in this laft fight, together with twentie thousand other Souldiors and Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of fuch as had not beene prefent at thefe battailes, with whome he knew that he shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he flood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this tryall, which canfed him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring 40 into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, That when one thought to haue terrified him by faying, That the flight of the Persian Arrowes was so thicke x as would hide the Sunne; he answered thus: It is very good newes, for then shall we fight in the coole shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely beene expressed in deedes, as it was vttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Laced emonians, though inferiour to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counfell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwayes well aduised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course 50 were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would affemble together to defend the Ifihmus, that ftraight necke of ground which joyneth Peloponne fus to the Continent. For which cause he aduised. That three hundred shippes well manned should be sent vnto the Coast of Laconia, to spoyle the Countrey, and to hold the Lacedamonians and their neighbours builed at home, whileft Acres at his leafure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power vpon them, who remaining deflitute of fuecour would be too weak alone to make relistance. To this purpose also the same Lemuratus further aduifed, that the faid fleet of three hundred thips should feife upon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying necre to the Coast of Laconia, might serue as a fit place of Rendez-vous vpon all occasions either of their owne defence or endamaging the enemie: whereby that auncient speech of Chilon the Lacedemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrie-men to haue that lledrowned in the Scathan stand so inconveniently as for themit did. What esteet this counsell might haue taken had it been followed it is not calle to guesse. Euta 10 contrarie opinion of Achemenes brother to King Nerves was preferred as the lafer. For the Persian fleet had bin forely vexed with a grieuous tempest, which continued three whole daies together, wherein were loft upon the coast of Magnesia four chundred thips of warre, belides other vestels innumerable, accordingly as artakanus had foreseene, that if any such calamitic should ouertake them, there would not be sound any Fiarbor wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achamenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his sleete; for if (said he) after the losse of sourch undred shippes wee shall send away other three hundred to seeke aduentures, then will the Greeke be strong enough by Scato encounter the rest of the Nauic, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counfell xerxes yeelded, hoping that his Land-armic 20 and fleete should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilest both held one course and lay not farre asunder. But herein he was farre deceived; for about the fame time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Nauie likewise made a sorrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecian fleete lay at that time at Artemifium in the straits of Eubara, where the Persians thinking to incompasse them, sent two hundred faile about the sland to fall upon them behinde, vling a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not vnlike, but with farredifferent successe. For that narrow channell of the Sea which divideth Eubas from the maine was in the same fort held by a Navie of two hundred three score and eleuen faile against the huge Persian Armsda, as the straits of 30 Thermopy is had formerly beene maintained by Leonidas, till he was so circumuented as this Nauie might haue been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred shippes that were sent about the Iland, and the cause of their voiage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleete, and soone enough disclosed to the Greeker, who setting faile by night met them with a counter-furprife, taking and finking thirtie veffels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being ouertaken with foule weather they were driven vpon the rocks and all calt away. Contrariewife the Nauie of the Greeks was increased by the arrivall of fiftie three Athenian thips, and one Lemnian which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces incouraged the one side: so the feare of Aerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeeme their losse with 40 some notable exploit. Wherefore setting alide their unfortunate pollicie, they refolured in plaine light to repaire their honour, and cashing themselues into the forme of a Crefcent, thought so to inclose the Greekes, who readily did present them battell

The fight indured from noone till night, and ended with equall loffe to both parts. For though more of the Persians shippes were sunke and taken, yet the lesser losse fell altogether as heauic vpon the Greeks fleet, which being small could worse beare it. Herein onely the Barbarians may feeme to haue had the worfe, that they forfooke the place of fight, leauing the wracke and spoiles to the enemie, who neuerthelesse were faine to abandon presently even the passage which they had vn-50 derraken to defend, both for that many of their ships were forely crusht in the battille, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leoni-Les at Thermopyle. Before they waied anchors, Themistocles generall of the Albenians engraned upon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should revolt vnto the Greekes or stand neutrall; which perswation the hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Theattempt of XERXES upon APOLLO's temple: and his taking of Athens.

CHAP. 6. S.4.

Hen Xerxes had paffed the straites of Thermopyla he wasted the Country of the Phocians and the regions adjoining: as for the inhabitants they chose rather to flie, and reserve themselves to a day of battaile, than to aduenture their lines into his hands, upon hope of fauing their wealth by making proffer vnto him of their feruice. Part of his ar-

mie he sent to spoile the Temple of Delphi; which was exceeding rich by meanes of many offerings that had there been made by divers Kings and great personages; Of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great altonishment that fell vpon the companies which arised at the Temple to have sacked it, and of two 20 Rockes that breaking from the mount Parnassus overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peraduenture somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, faith, That the broken Rocks remained euen to his memorie in the Temple of Minerua, whither they rowled in their fall. And furely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for feeing he beleeued that Apollo was a God, he should not haue dared to entertaine a couetous desire of inriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chaflishis impictie, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Diuell, by that Holicone, who faith, Will a man spoile his Gods? and elsewhere; Hath any nation chan-Malas ed. w.s.

ged their Gods, which yet are no Gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and fend to Ke- tereme, 2009. 30 dar and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impictic of & 10. Xerxes was the more inexculable, for that the Perssans alleadged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they fet fire on the Citie of Sardis in Afia, to be the ground and cause of the wast which they made in burnings of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterpife against Delphos, this Vizzor of holie and zealous revenge falling off, discovered the face of covetousnesse so much the more ouglie, by how much the more themselues had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meere mischance.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did may be expressed briefly thus. He came to Athens, which finding for faken he tooke, & burnt the Cittadel and temple which was there-40 in. The Cittadell indeed was defended a while by fome of more courage than wifedome, who literally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should bee fafe in woodden walls, had fortified that place with boords and Paliffadoes: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yeelded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the prophecie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the wordes to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to wordes.

How THEMISTOCLES the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

He Athenians had, before the comming of Xerxes, removed their wives and children into Trazene, Agina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses, and lands, as their freedome, and the common libertie of Greece. Neuertheleffe this great zeale, which the Athenians did 10 thew for the generall good of their Countrie, was ill requited by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to flay for them at S4lamis, whilest they remoued the wines and children out of their Citie. But when the Citie of Athens was taken, it was prefently resolved upon, that they should forfake the He of Salamis, and with-draw the fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortific against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by Land. and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece, as indefensible, to the furie of the enemie. So should the Hands of Salamis and Leina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) have beene giuen ouer into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themistocles, Admirall 20 of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with feare of looking their owne, which they would not hazard, that no perswasions could obtain of them, to regard the estate of their distreffed friends, and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemie at Salamis; As first in private vnto Eurybiades the Lacedamonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the felfe same feare which made them for fake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to diffcuer the fleet, and every one of the Confederates to with-draw himfelfe to the defence of his owne Citie and estate; Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion 30 did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might worke in them hereafter) he shewed that the fight at Isihmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the straights; and that, besides the safeguard of Egina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus, which the Barbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victoric by Sea: which they could not fo well hope for elfe-where, as in that prefent place which gauethem to good advantage. All this would not ferue to retaine the Pe-Ispennelians, of whom one, vnworthy of memorie, vpbraided Themiflocles with the loffe of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for fuffering one to speake in the Councell, that 40 had no Countrie of his owne to inhabite. A base and shamefull objection it was, to lav as a reproch that loffe, which being voluntarily fustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themissocles, and put into his mouth a reply fo sharpe, as availed more than all his former perswasions. Hee told them all plainely, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well-neare two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Gracian fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the world, and settle themselues in a more secure babitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie to had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Towne in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Towne he faid an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in processe of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth hee) will we plant our felnes, leauing vnto you a forrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your owne vnthankfulneffe. The Peloponnefians hearing thus much, beganne to enter into better confideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceived, you so weake termes, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might inforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condessed ucen to the vttermost of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leauing their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessitie should inforce them so farre, for the preservation of their libertie; did imploy the most of their private wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Nauic. By these meanes they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no fuch calamitie should befall them by land. as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sca : Knowing well, that a firong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a fecure paffage to any other Countrie. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships they did somewhat amend their Nauie. Whereby it came to passe, that, had they beene vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either prefent death, or perpetual flauerie; neither could they hope to be victorious without the ashiltance of the Atherians, whose forces by Sea did equal all their stogether; the whole confifting of no more than three hundred and fourescore bostomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which 20 would have flood vpon desperate points, if the fleet of Athens had for saken them; were soone perswaded, by the greater feare of such a bad cuent, to forget the lesser, which they had conceived of the Persians: and laying a-fide their infolent brauerie, they yeelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis.

V I.

How the Persians consulted about giving battaile: and how Themistocles by policie held the Greekes to their resolution; with the vidoric at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

N the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were conucnient to offer battaile to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captaines giving such aduise as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soone agreed upon the fight: but Artemisia Queene of Halicarnaffus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person. was of contrarie opinion. Her counfaile was, that the King himfelfe directly should march toward Peloponne sus, whereby it would come to passe that the Greeke Nauie, (vnable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should pre-40 fently be diffeuered, and enery one feeking to preferue his owne Citie and goods, they should, being divided, prove vnable to relist him, who had wonne so farre your them when they held together. And as the profit will bee great in forbearing to giue battaile; so on the other side the danger will bee more (said shee) which wee shall under-goe, than any neede requireth vs to aduenture upon; and the losse, in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victorie which we defire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is no more than they would have done, wee fitting still: but if they, as better Sca-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the journey to Peloponnefus is vtterly dasht, and many that now declare for vs, will soone revolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom xerxes had fent for that purpose to the fleet, related vn-50 to his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduise; yet resolued vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse have beene the same which Artemisia gaue, had not seare and flatterie made all the Captaines vtter that as out of their owne indgement, which

Of thinges following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight

Fter this victorie, the Greekes intending, by way of scrutinie, to deter-nine which of the Captaines had belt merited of them, in all this great feruice; enery Captaine, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place, as best descruing next vnto himselfe, almost euery Suffrage did concurre 10 vpon Themislocles. Thus private affection yeelded vnto vertue, as soone as her owne turne was ferued. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamitic, beganne to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might casily discerne his faint heart, through his painted lookes. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to cast a warie eie vpon his Master, fearing least his counsaile should bee rewarded according to the euent. Wherefore purpoling rather to aducature his life in pursuit of the victorie, than to cast it away by under going his Princes indignation; he adused the King to leave vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promised to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scopter. Here-20 withall he forgot not to footh Xerxes with many faire wordes; telling him, that the cowardife of those Agyptians, Phanicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like mettall, nothing better than flaues, who had so ill behaued themselues in the late Seafernice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies beene victorious, and had alreadic subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it selfe, against which the Warrewas principally intended. These wordes found very good acceptance in the Kings care, who presently betooke himselfe to his journey homewards, making the more half, for that he vinderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to saile to Hedesport, and there to breakedowne his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no fuch intent, but rather wished his hastic departure, 30 knowing that he would leaue his Armie not fo ftrong, as it should have beene, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counsaile that by no meanes they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, least necessitie should inforce the Persians to take courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beafts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, fend a false advertisement to this timorous Prince, advising him to convay himselfe into Mia with all speede, before his bridge were dissoluted : which counsaile .Kernes tooke very kindly, and halfilly followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessell, 42 it is not greatly materiall; though the Greeker did most willingly imbrace the later of these reports. How so euer it were, this flight of his did well ease the Countrie; that was thereby difburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before ouer-whelmed it.

The negotiations betweene MARDONIVS and the Athenians, as also betweene the Athenians and Lacedamonians; after the flight of XERXES.

Ardonivs with his three hundred thousand had with-drawne himfelfe into Theffalie, whence he lent Attander; the fonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassadour to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received, and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne desires; allowing them to retaine

they thought most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Acres had entertained a vaine perswasion of much good, that his owne presence vpon the flore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he incamped upon the Sea-lide, pitching his owne Tent on the mount & galeus which is opposite vinto the He of Salamis, whence at cale hee might fafely viewall which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write downe the acts and behausour of cuery Captaine. The neare approch of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countrimen shewed in fortifying the Ijihmus, and of a Perfian Armie marching a-pace thither, did now againe to cerrific and amaze the Peloponneflans, that no intreatie, nor contestation to would fuffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madneffe to fight for a Countrie alreadie loft, when they rather should endeauour to faue that which remained viconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what miserie would befall them, if looking the victorie, they should be driven into Salamis, there to bee first vp, and belieged round in a poore defolate Hand.

Hercupon they resolved forth-with to set faile for Isthmus: which had presently beene done, if the wisedome of Themistocles had not preuented it. For he perceiuing what a violent feare had stopt vp their cares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to preuent the execution of this vnwholsome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to find him busie in wrangling 20 altercation. As soone as the Councell brake vp, hee dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to fend part of their Nauie about the lland, which incompasfing the Greekes might preuent their escape; giving them withall a false hope of his affiftance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleeved these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their owne affured, if the Athenian fleet joyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citie, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they 30 found themselues inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all night, fending many of their ships about the Ile of Salamis, to charge the enemie in reare, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Psyttalea, which lieth ouer against Salamis, to faue fuch of their owne, and kill fuch of the Gracian partie, as by any miffortune should be cast upon the shore. Thus did meere necessitie enforce the Grecians to undertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the formost of their enemies, and chaling the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flie. I doe not finde any particular occurrences in this great battaile to be much remarkeable. Sure it is that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearifome taske of writing downe many difa- 40 sters that befell the Persian fleet, which ill acquited it selfe that day, doing no one peece of service worthie the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might well feeme to have wrought out that victorie with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Azina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-Armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Agina having possessed the straights did sinke or take them, whilest the Athenians did valiantly give charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance

their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with xerxes, and affift him in that Warre.

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought back their wines and children: for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be fecure, till the Armie of Alardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedemonians, understanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, leaft hee should finde good and readic acceptance. Hereupon they likewife very speedily dispatched their Embassadours for Athens, who arriving, before the Macedonian had audience, vsed the best of their perswation to retaine the Athenians firme. They alleaged that neither Nernes 10 nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had only threatned the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselues in desence of that Citic, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the thenians without much crueltic of injustice could not leave them. Wee know, said they, that yee haue induced great calamities, looling the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to for fake the Towne, the houses whereof beer uined, and vnfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintaine as our owne, your wines and children amongst vs, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who have alwaies procured libertic to others, will not now goe about to bringall Greece into flaueric and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, 22 but their wordes and oathes are of no affurance. It was needlesse to vie many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answere to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadours; That whilest the Sunne continued his course they would be Enemies to Merkes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might feeke to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wines and children, it was a burden which they promifed to fuftaine themselues, only desiring the Lacedamonians, that with all speede they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long fit fill in Theffalie, having once received fuch a peremptorie answere. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to inuade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as 30 foone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they having now the fecond time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arrivall of their Confederates.

From Athens he fent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with for laking their houses so often, would bee desirous to present them from fire, and to have those which were alreadie laid wast, reedified at the Kings charges, Or if this affection tooke no place with them, but that needes they 40 would relie vpon their old Confederates, whose succours did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might bee wonne with great rewards, to draw them to his purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master King Nerves, who must thereby needes vnderstand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the ftrongest part of their owne Countrie. But his expestation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrsilus, aduised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propound them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Counfaile-house heard what he had said, immediately fet vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were feare or money, that had moued him to vtter such a vile sentence. Yea the women of A thens in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counfaile, and bad end, affembling together, did enter his house there, and put his wife and children to the like execution.

All this brauerie notwithflanding, when they perceiued the flackneffe of the Pelononnesians in gining them aide, they were faine to betake themselues to Salamis againe, the old place of their fecuritie. Remaining there, and feeing little forwardneffe in those whom it most concerned to assist them, they fent very senere messages to Sparta, complaining of their flackneffe, and threatning with all, to take fuch courfe as might fland best with their owne good, seeing that the common estate of all was folittle regarded. These messens were at the first entertained with dilatorie anfweres, which every day grew colder, when as the Pelaponnefian Wall, builded athwart the Ifthmue, was almost finished. But as the Lacedemonians waxed carelese and dull, fo the Athenians hotly prefled them to a quicke resolution, giuing them plainely to understand, that if they should hold on in those dilatorie courses, it would not be long ere the Citic of Athens tooke a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring to draw nearer vnto Greece, as being now too weake at Sea. Likewise the Greekills Nauie contained it selfe within the Harbours vpon Europe side; both to doe service where neede should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest had adventuredouer farre. So mutuall feare preferred in quiet the Hands lying in the middest of the Agen Scas. But it was well and seasonably observed by a Counsailor of 20 Sparta, that the wall vpon Isthmus would serve to little purpose for the desence of Pelaponnefus, if once the Athenians gave care to Murdonius : confidering that many dores would be opened into that Demic-Hand, as soone as the Enemie should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedemonians vpon this admonition, making better perviall of their owne dangers, were very carefull to give satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadours, who not brooking their delaies, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it feemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away fine thousand Spartans in the enening, vnder conduct of Paulanias; they gave audience the next day to the Embassadors, whole complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesse; 20 deeply swearing that the Armie of Sparta was alreadie farre vpon the journey; and giuing them leaue to take vp other five thousand Licedemonians, out of the Region adjoyning, to follow after them.

The Athenius, though distalting such want of gravitie, in a matter so important, were neverthelesse contented with the finall conclusion; and leaving the number appointed of Lieckamonius Souldiers, made what hast they could to incamp in Attest. The other Greeius were nothing slack in sending forth Companies, whose neare approch caused Mardonius to forsake Attea as a rough Countrie, and therefore of much disduantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he burnt the Citic of Athen, beating downer the walls of it, and ruitoning all that had formerly scaped the surious Varre.

IX.

The great battaile of Platese.

The Armie of Mardonius contained about three hundred thou fand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Armie; to whom were adjoyned the forces of Theles, Masedonie, The state, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian,

furnished

furnilhed his Campe with fiftie thousand men. Against these the Lacedamonians, at themans, and their Confederates, had leaused an Armie of one hundred and ten thousand, of which fortie thousand were waightily at med, the rest were only affisiants to these fortie thousand, being armed more flightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to fullatine any strong charges.

Thefe two Armies having cleuen daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable peece of feruice 3 (Mardonius, whose victualls beganne to faile, resoluted to beginne the fray. The Greeks were promised victorie by an Orace, if they fought in the Land of the Athenium, and in the plaine of Ceres and Proforma, making praires who certaine Gods, Demi-Gods, and Nymphs, But it was hard to finde the certaine place which the Grade deligned. For the plaine of Ceres was indeeded in the Territoric of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proforpius, neare who the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorialls of those Nymphs, and Demi-Gods, were in the same place, you Mount Cathonous, and the ground served will for soot-men against horse; only the Land belonged who the Plateans, and not wrothe Atheniuss.

Whileft the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull or rade; the Planens, to make all cleare, did freely bestow their Land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Ploteons caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, 13 to recdiffee their Citie, which was ruined in the Peloponnessan warres.

All thinges being readie for battaile; the Lacedemonian Generall thought it most meete, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartan, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed vpon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedamonians; which Mardonius understanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Perfams had felt heavie proofe, or defiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the brauch Souldiers of Greece) hee did also change the order of his 30 battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceive how the Enemie did shift his wings, and Pausamas thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spentin changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into confultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemie, lie neare to that Fountaine which did serve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Armie being fent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which 49 to him seemed to proceede out of meere cowardise) he charged them in reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valor, That the Laced emonians being ouer-taken by the Enemies horse, and ouer-whelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victoric were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and flaine, and some of especiall marke lost, before any signe of good successeappeared

But as Sone as Paulanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superfittion of that Age and Countrienceounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of bat-taile; and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did lit vpon the ground, as was yet their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barkanias, that came througing vpon them without any stare of such notable resistance. Therest of the Greeke Armie that was in march, being retoked by Paufanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedamonians only that part of the Armie which was led by the Athemans, could not arrive vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greekes confiderated with the Persians; gaue them check by the way. Neuerthelesse, the Spartans with other their Assistants, did so well acquite themselues, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slaine in the field; the rest sledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with woodden walls, and there delended themselues with such courage as desperate necessitie insorced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lacdemonians were not acquainted with the manner of affaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the meane season the Athenians, to having found strong opposition of the Thebans and Thessalians, did with much labour and courage obtaine victorie, which having not long purfued, they came to helpe the Lacedamorians, whom they found wearily bulied in affaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves under-tooke it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all fides, the Greekes entred, with fuch furie, and inft defire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to have left three thousand alives excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when the Persian Armie first fell

If the execution were fo great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was 20 the foolish retrait, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were to, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselues into it, greater than of the Assailants; yet they being of seuerall Nations and Languages, and having loft their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was unpossible that they in such a terrour and assonishment should make good that peece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrie, against an Armie of men, farre more valiant than themselues, and inflamed with present victorie. Therefore the same wall which for a few houres had preserved their lives, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them, and leave them to the flaughtering furie of vnpittifull Victors. Artabasis 30 fled into Thrace, telling the people of Theffalie, and other Countries in his way, That hee was fent by Merdonius vpon some peece of service : For hee well knew, that had they vinderstood any thing of that great discomfiture, all places would have beene hostile vnto him, and sought with his ruine to purchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and lost, hee came to Byzantium; whence hee shipped his men ouer into Asa. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnder-taken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and great Conquest, though sorting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-scene, and rather worse, for as much as it beganne the quarrell, which 40 neuer ended, before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected, by that Nation of the Greekes despised and sought to have beene brought into slauerie, Hereby it may sceme, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himfelfe, who had formerly disposed of those thinges, ordaining the subuerfion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entred into greater confideration of their owne strength, and the weakenesse of their Enemies.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the likes.

He fame day on which the battaile was fought at Plate, there was an other battaile fought at Afficile, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Afficial Where the Perlian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirall s of 10 the Greeke Nauie, at the request of some Ilanders and Ionians did faile into those parts, to deliner the Samians, and procure the Ionians to renolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sea-side, having left threescore thousand vnder the command of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admiralls of the Persian fleet, understood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a ground, fortifying with Palissadoes and otherwife as much ground as did feeme needfull for the encamping of all their Land and Sca-forces. Leutychides at his arrivall, perceiving that they meant to keepe within their strength, and resoluing to force them out of it, rowed with his Gallie 20 close aboard the shore, and called vpon the Ionians ( who more for feare than good will were encamped among the Perfians) exhorting them in the Greeke tongue to remember libertie, and vse the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it, Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubaa; trusting that either these perswasions would prevaile, or if the Persians did happen to understand them. that it would breede some jelousie in them, causing them to fight in feare of their owne Companions. It neede not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing auailed Themistocles, did now very happily succeede. For Xernes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of A/is to revolt; who now, in his declining estate, gave a willing 30 eare to the fiveet found of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former brauerie, little regarded and leffe feared any treafon, to be contriued by their Subjects, were now fo warie, that from the Samians, which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milesians, whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Micale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, tooke courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold upon fuch weapons as came to hand, affailed the Persians manfully within the Camp; which example the Ionians prefently followed, being very glad to haue found fome that 40 durit beginne. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in march towards the Enemies campe, a rumour fuddenly ranne in the Armie that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Platee was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report, of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Amylius ouerthrew Parfeus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four edgies, as Liuie with others do record. And Palutach hast many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the River Sagra in Italia, which was heard of the same day in Paloponness. That of the battaile against the Tanguniums and the Latines, presently 50 noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victorie obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebell to Domitism the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armic with gifts and promifes, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himfelfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with care of a dangerous Warre; it was fuddainely reported that Antonius was flaine, and his Armic defeated.

Hereupon many did offer facrifice to the Gods, and shew all manner of publique joy, as in fuch cases was accustomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not bee found; the Emperour Domition betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebell; and being with his Armie in march, hee receiued aduertisement by Poste, of the Victorie obtayned, 10 and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfe same victorie, hee found that the report and victorie were borne vpon one day, though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about > fine and twentie hundred miles) a-funder. It is truly faid of Pintarch, that this last example giues credit vnto many the like. And indeede it were very strange, if among fo many rumours, begotten by forgerie or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not bee found (as happens in dreames among many thousand vaine and friuolous) a few precifely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himfelfe doth fometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noises; as hee raised 20 the fiege of Samaria, by cauling a found of Horses and Chariots to assight the Aramites; and as hee threatned Senacherib, faying : Behold, I will fend a blast Efay 1,71.3. wpon him, and hee shall heare a noise, and returne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well have beene true, that God was pleased by such a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavie hearts, being in great feare, least their owne adventure should by no meanes fall out well; confidering in what danger they had left their Countrie of Greece, which was readie to bee subdued by Merdonius, whilest they went wandring to feeke out enemies a-farre-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the same of the battaile fought at Platee being noised among them; every man desired that his owne 30 valour in the present fight, might bee some helpe to worke out the full deliuerance of Greece. In this alacritic of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battaillions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directly towards the enemies campe; the Lacedsmonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and ftraight paffages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedemonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly affaultit, that they brake way through the Palissadoes and Gabions, and made themselues Masters of the place, flaying all that could not faue themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good feruice, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Miessians, who vponthe like jelousse, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mysale, to defend the passages; did now (as if they had beene set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as sell into their hands, letting none cleape, except a very lew, that shed through by-pathes. The Lacedemonium that day did little struice, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke such Companies as retyred in whole troupes; making them slied dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Abilesians were enabled to doe the greater execution ypon them. This was the last sight of that buge Armie leavied against Greece, which was now viterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offensiue Warre.

Exxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had hee to reuenge either this or other his great loffes, 16 being wholly given ouer to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom when hee could not prevaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his defire by force, because hee respected much his Brother her husband, he thought it best to make a match betweene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meanes to finde occasion of such familiaritie, as might worke out his delire. But whether it were fo, that the chafittie of the Mother did ftill reject him, or the beautie of her Daughter allure him: hee foone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vitious Prince, and as ill able to goucene himfelfe in peace, as to guide his Armie in Warre. This yong Ladie having once defired the King to give her the Garment which hee 20 then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceine her hulbands connerfation with her, which shee imputed not so much to the beautie of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon thee conceiued extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant enery request, shee craued that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands Brother, the yong Ladies Mother. might bee given into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either haue reformed the abuse of such a custome, or haue deluded the importunate crueltie of his Wife, by threatning her selfe with the like, to whatsoeuer shee should inflict upon the innocent Ladie, granted the request; and sending for 30 his brother perswaded him to put away the Wife which hee had, and take one of his Daughters in her flead. Hereby it seemes, that hee viderstood how vilainously that poore Ladic should bee intreated, whom hee knew to bee vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Mussiles refused to put her away; alleaging his owne ioue, her deferuing, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to moue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; saying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor haue his Daughter whome hee had promifed vnto him. Massites was much grieued with these wordes, but much more, when returning home, hee found his Wife most but- 40 cherly mangled by the Queene Imestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Eares, and Tongue to bee cut off, and her Breafts in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogs. Massless enraged with this vilanie, tooke his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Province hee was Gouernour, intending to rebell and auenge himselfe. But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an Armie to bee leaused, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Companie to the fword. Such was the tyrannicall condition of the Persian Gouernement; and such are generally the effects of Luxurie,

Yet of xerses it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore 50 alexander the Great, finding an Image of his ouer-throwne, and lying youn the ground, faid, 7 hat hee doubted, whether, in regard of his vertue, hee flould againe erect it, or, for the mischiefe done by him to orace., flould let it lie.

But furely what focuer his other good qualities were the was foolish, and was a coward, and confequently mercilesse.

Therefore wee may firmely beleeue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Perfian Empire was so furely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, and other work Princes, could not onerthrow it, wntill it was broken by a vertue almost equal to that which did establish it. In warres against the Legystians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had beene, very good; but against the generall estate of Greece. In either hee, nor any of his potteritie, did euer make offensite warre, but receiued many to loss in Asia, to which the last at Mysale served but as an introduction; teaching the Greeks, and especially the Asthenians, that the Persian was no better Southier at his owne dores, than in a forraine Countrie: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Ashens were quietly settled and affured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historic of Greece, taking in the matters of  $Per/\beta a$ , as also the chare of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the  $Per/\beta a$  chare continued in her greatnesse, many Ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Majeslie of a great Empire.

But this greatnessee the second only upon the riches and power that had formerly beene acquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excession Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that eure were, haue beene encruated, made unweldie, and (as it were) fattened for the hungrie swords of poore and hardie Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that Xrxxx and his Successions were faine to defend their Crownes with money and base Policies; very seldome or neuer (valessee in the title Nation of Greece, which would some haue ruined the status with that little Nation of Greece, which would some haue ruined the foundations laid by Crow, had not private malice and jelouse typed euery

Citie to enuie the height of her Neighbours walls, and thereby diuerted the fwords of the Greekes into their owne bowells, which after the departure of Xrews beganne very well, and might better have continued, to hew out the way of conquest on the side of

Of things that passed in Greece from the end of the Persian Warre to the beginning of the Peloponnesian.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

TER that the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were vtterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commaunded the Gracian Armie, leauing the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians. affifted by the revolted lones, returned with the Lacedamonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta, and o- 20 ther places, out of which they had been leuied. The Athenians in the meane while befieged Seflos, 2 Citie on the strait of the Hellefont, betweene which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselves the Winter following on that side the Hellesport. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children, fince the invafion of Aftica, and the abandoning of Athens, in divers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and the walls of the Citie over-turned, yet they resolved first on their common desence, and to fortific their Citie, before they cared to couer themselues, their wines and children, with any private buildings: Whereof the Lacedemonians being aducrtised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citie of Sparta was vinwalled, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerfull by Sea, than either themselves, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched mellengers to the Athenians to diffuade them; not acknowledging any privat millike or jealoutic, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than 40 heretofore, the same would serue to receive their enemies, and to be made a Seat for the Warre; as Thebes had lately beene. To this the Athenians promifed to give them fatisfaction by their owne Embaffadors very speedily. But being resolued to goe on with their workes by the aduise of Themistocles, they held the Lacedamonians in hope of the contrarie, till they had rayled their wals to that height, as they cared not for their millikes, nor doubted their difturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themislocles towards Lacedemon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arrivall of his sellow-Commillioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedemonians expectation being converted into jealousie (for by the arrivall of divers persons out 50 of Atrica, they were told for certaine, That the wals of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themisteeles prayed them not to belieue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolue themselues, and determine accordingly. Which request being graunted, and Commissioners sent, Themillocles dispatched one of his owne, by whome hee aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Laced emonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till himselfe and the other Athenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their libertie also to returne. Which done, and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was alreadic defensible on all parts, Themistocles demaunding audience, made the Lacedemonians know. That it was true that the wals of Athens were now rayled to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedamonians to 10 beleeue, That whenfoeuer it pleafed them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for fuch, as right well understood what appertained to a Commonweale and their owne safetie, without direction and adulse from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselves to the woodden wals of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or perfuaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or lesse fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes; And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their owne affaires, and thought it good 20 reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the wals of Athens should be finished and maintained.

The Lacedemonians finding the time vnfit for quarrell, diffembled their mislike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the division, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received backe from them their owne Embaffadors.

The wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might vnder couert imbarke themselues vpon all occasions.

ð. I I.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State wpon the Perlian.

He Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirtie Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedamonians added other twentie; and with this Fleet. strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they set fayle for Cypres, under the conduct of Paufanias the Lacedamonian;

where after their landing having possess themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouring from the Persians 40 by force the Citie Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behaving himselfe more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Nerves, was called backe by the Councell of Lacedamon, and not onely accused of many infolent behauiors, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treafon against his Countrey. In his stead they imployed Docres, who either gaue the fame cause of offence; or else the Achenians, who affected the first commaundement in that warre, practifed the fouldiors to complaine; though indeed the wife and vertuous behauior of Ariffides, Generall of the Albenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable finceritie, had beene able to make a good Commaunder feeme ill in comparison of himselfe; and therefore was much more availeable in rendring those 50 detelted, whose vices affoorded little matter of excuse. Howsoener it were, the Lacedemonians being no leffe wearie of the warre, than the Athenians were eagre to purfue it, the one obtained their ease and the other the execution and honor which they defired: for all the Greekes (those of Peloponnes excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to leuie money, according to their diferetion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe fide, in Alia the leffe, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threefcore Talents; which was rayled easily by the honest care of that just man Arifiides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Ariftides, and other worthie Citizens, brought vnto the Athenians great commoditie; so the defire which they conceived of encreasing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall love, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treafure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these foure hundred and threescore Talents were rayled to fix hundred, nor long, after that, ere their couctous Tyrannie had connerted their followers into flaues, and extorted from them yearely thirteene hundred Talents. The Isle of Lelos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were layd vp; and where, at the generall assemblie, the Captaines of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for forme lake called to confultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger 29 by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt up the common treasure in an Island, under their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commaunder in this Warre was Cimon, the sonne of Militades, who first tooke Eiona, upon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mattered the Cariffi, and brought into feruitude the 2 (4xi), contrarie to the forme of the confederacie: So did they other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they fayled of their contribution, or disobeyed their commaundements; taking vpon them and vfurping a kind of foueraigneauthoriticouer the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become 30 Lords of the Sea, and could not be relifted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne persons, and given vp altogether to their ease, made choise rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in thippes; leauing the prouition of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and imployed in honourable Seruices, at the coit of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, leuied vpon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good be- 40 ginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Afiaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phaselis; which having formerly pretended neutralitie, and refused to relieue, or any way affift the Greekes, were enforced to pay tenne Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearely contribution.

From thence he fet fayle for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylis, where the Persim Fleer rode, being of like hundred sayle, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fiftie, and having a great Land. Armie, encamped vponthe sheare, as which forces having beene provided for advanting the Kings 50 affaires in Greece, were exterly defeated in one day, and two hundred shippes taken by the Athenians, the rell being broken to pieces, or sinke, ere ever they had swomme in the Greekish Seas. Cimen having in one day obtained two great vistories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very soone presented with a third. For fourescore sayle of Phamicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, vnder the Persian commaund) thinking to have joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived yoon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Vpon the first notice of their approach Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they only sought to runne themselves on ground; by which meane preserving sew of their men, they lost all their shippes. These losses did so breake the courage of the Persian, that, omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condifcended to what souer Articles is pleaded the Athenians to propound, graunting life their work of the Martice with the State of the State of

This was the most honourable peace that euer the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glorie of the whole Nation, till since time as, vnder Alexander, they ouer threw the Empire of Persta; in which Warre sew, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great commaund, but served altogether under the Macedonians.

The death of XERXES by the treason of ARTABANVS.

Efides these losses, which could not easily have beene repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gaue just cause to the Perssan of seeking peace vpon any tearmes not altogether into leable. For Atabams, the vucle of Xexxs, perceiving, that the King his maister did easily take small occasions to shed the bloud of 3 flich, as in kindred or place were nere vitto him, began to repose lesse hope of fastice in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignetie, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his crueltie, and despided for his cowardise and misfortunes. Hauing conceiued this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Midwidstes an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himselse had been einnocent) he accused Darian the sonne of Arraes, and caused him to suffer death as a Paricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesse begin the Kingdome, and held it seuen moneths, or whether intending the like cuill to Artaeraes the sonne of Arraes, he was by him preuented and surprised, it were hard to affirme any occariancie. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie part to death by extreame torments, according to the sentence, whereof the truth is more auncient than the Verse.

The banishment of THEMISTOCLES: His slight to ARTAXERXES newly raigning in Persia; and his death.

all training

RTAXERXES being established in his Kingdome, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessitie of his affaires required, began to conceine new hopes of better fortune against the Greekes, than he or his predecessions had euer hitherto found. For 10 the people of Athens, when the Persians were chassed out of Greece, did so highly value their owne merites in that service, that they not onely thought it fit for themselues to become the Commanders ouer many Townes and Islands of the Greekes, but, euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Gouernment than meerely Democraticall. Herein they were fo infolent, that no integritie nor good defert was able to preserue the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the rafcall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deedes to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet 20 now prefuming vpon his good feruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reason they might graunt him the libertie to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearling the benefits which they had received from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby he was banished for tenne yeares, as a man ouer-burthenfome to the Commonwealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Laced errordans, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Hereupon Themifinding no place of fecuritie against the malice of two fuch mightie Cities, 20 was driuen, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous remouings, to aduenture himselse into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artanernes had conceiued of advancing his affaires by the counfell and affiftance of Themiffedes, proued altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Lybian, (who intested Agypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian ) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Egypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King fend his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make 40 good the hopes which he had given, of affuring the Persian estate against the

But whether Themistocles perceived much vnlikelinesse of good successe, in leading a great Armic of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in fauor of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to feeke honour by the ruine of it: fure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to vidertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict betweene thankfulnesse to his well-deserving Prince, and naturall affection to his owne ill-deseruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poylon.

CHAP. 7. S.5. of the Historie of the World.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Agypt.

Hen was Artaxernes driven to vse the service of his owne Captaines in the £ epptian watre, wherein it appeared well, T hat a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemic. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred sayle strong was sent torth under Cimon, to take in the life of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine, and the second strong the large strong to the second series and the second series are series as the second series and the second series are series as the second series are series are series as the second series are series as the second series are series are series as the second series are series are series are series are series are series are se the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieue the Island. Now although it were fo, that a peace had beene concluded, which was likely to haue beene kept fincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Gracian valour, that he was nothing defirous to build any shippes of Warre (without which the Greekes could receive no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found fayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole effate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemie too farre ouer-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were 20 in doubt, lest the league which in his owne worser fortunes hee had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore fought to get fuch affurance into their hands, as might vtterly disable him from attempting aught against them; or whether the increase of their reuenues and power, by adding that rich and great Iland to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profite; they thought it the wifest way, to take whilest they might, what socuer they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The sle of Cypres lying in the bottome of the straights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mightie at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselfe by trade with those Countries, or to insest one or 30 more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already denoured, in conceit, this Iland, was on the sodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morsell, to snatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might eafily have swallowed and digested. For Ingrus King of the Lybians confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Country was exhausted by the late warres, and how weakely defended by very slender Persian garrisons, conceined rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sodaine of his owne Gardes, or leuie out of the ordinarie Garrisons, were by him defeated ; the naturalls of the Countrey, not long fince oppreffed by Cambyses, and after a reuolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with 40 him who had no other title to that kingdome than agood fword. Further, he perswaded himselfe that the people, vnable to defend themselves against the Persian without his affiltance; would eafily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for king. Neither did this hope deceiue him. For hauing taken and cruelly flaine Achemenes the Viceroy; divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclayming him king, thewed the most of their endeuour for prosecution of the warre. But hee confidering his owne weakenesse, and that the meanes of the Exprians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived wel, that to relift the power of Artiserses, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price focuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the 30 great Athenian fleete, and knowing well the vertue of the fouldiers therein embarqued; he inuited the Commaunders to share with him the kingdome of Agypt as a farre greater reward of their aduenture, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their effate. Whether hee or they (if things had wholy forted according to their expectation) would have beene contented with an equall share, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination vnnecessarie. Hee was possessed of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affaires was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe: For they entred the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it feife they tooke two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they layd fuch hard fiege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in £gypt, were strong enough to remoue them; neither could Artanernes well deuise what meanes to vie for the recoucie of that which was loft, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by to fetting the Lacedamonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure affiftance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainement of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemie. To this purpose he sent Alegabizas to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedemonians were nothing forward in imploying their whole force against the Athenians, whome in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Armie in Egypt; he thought it his wifest way to imploy the rest of his money and means to their reliefe, who had now the space of fixe yeares defended his mailters right to in Agypt. Therefore he hashily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zepyrus, who arriving in £gypt, was first encountred by the revolted people; out whome he obtained a victoric, which made him mailter of the Countrey, whileh the Athenians lay builed about Memphis the great Citie. It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supplie, had much enfecbled the Athenians: fure it is, that when Mogahazus, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessaries made the Athenians inferior to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as they were forst to fortifie themselues in the lile of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eighteene 30 the liners of moneths fiege, turning away one part of the Riner by diners Trenches, affaulted the Athenian without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the of the out-lets sword, sauc a few that saucd themselves by slight into Lybia; the same entertainement had fiftie other Gallies which they fent to the fuccour of the first two hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was confumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendefum, and fell vnawares among the Phanician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recoursed all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them All taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians fixe yeares warre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanitie and indifcretion to vidertake many enterpiles at 40

Otwithstanding these ouerthrowes in Agypt, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedemonians, Corinthians, and 50 others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere vnto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, fo they obtained two great victories soone after; the one over the Peloponnessans, neere vnto Cecryphalia; the other ouer the Eginets, necre vnto Egina; where they funke and carried away threefcore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the Juddaine, and belieged Egina, from whence they could not be moued, not with handing that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall loffe, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to fet vp their Trophie, as Victors in the former battaile, were vtterly broken and flaughtered by the Ashenian Garrisons, and Megarians, to their great losse

Againe, as the Athenians were discomsitted neare to Tanagra by the Lacedamonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians, ( at which 10 time the Thesalian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and sought against them) so about threescore daies after, the Athenians entred Baotia under the conduct of Asyronides, where beating that Nation, they wanne Phocis on the gulfe Octeus, and cuened the walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they inforced &einatorender vpon most base conditions; as to beate downe the walls of their Citie. and to give them hostages for Tribute; the tiege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victoriesthey fackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnes belonging to the Lacedemonisms; wanne vpon the Corinthians, and ouerthrew the Siegonians that came to their succour. These were the vndertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those fixe yeares that a part of their forces made warrein Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Theffalie, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were relisted by the King Pharfalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victoric ouer those that resifled, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five yeares, and sent Cimoninto Cyprus with two hundred ships, but they were againe allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Wooddie parts of Azypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixtie of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Comon dying there, as they coasted the Iland, incountred a fleet of the Pho-30 nicians and Cilicians, ouer both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also thosereturned safe which were sent into Egypt.

Of ARTAXERXES LONGIMANVS, that he was AHASHVEROSH the husband of Queene HESTES.

Hese Agyptian troubles being ended, the raigne of Artaxerxes continued peaceable, whereof the length is by some reftrained into twen-tie yeares, but the more and better Authors give him fortie, some al-low vnto him foure and fortie. To proue that this was the King who gaue countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needlesse trauaile; considering that all the late Diuines have taken very much paine, to shew that those two Prophets were licenced by him, and succoured in that building, in such fort as apjo peares in their writings.

This was likewise that King Abashuerosh who maried Hester. Wherof if it be needfull to give proofe, it may fuffice; That Ahashwerosh lived in Susa, raigning from India to Atliopis, and therefore must have been a Persian; That hee lived in peace, as appeares by the circumstances of the Historie, and vsed the counsaile of the seuen

The continual Warres which exercised King Darius the sonne of Hystastes, together with the certainctic of his marriages with fundrie wines, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his first wife Atoffa, the daughter of Cyrus, alive in great honour, thee being mother to Xerxes the fucceeding King; doe manifeltly proue that tiefer was not his. Whereunto is added by Philothe Iem, That at the perswafion of Mardochess, Ioiachim the high Priest the sonne of Iefua, caused the feast of Purim to bee instituted in memorie of that deliuerance. Now the time of Ioiachim was in the raigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of Efdr.us, and Nehemias: Iefua his 10 father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of warres, with other his furious and tragical loues, wherewith Xernes did confume fuch little time as hee had free from warre, are enough to proue, that the storie of Hester pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twentie yeares, wheras the two & thirtieth of zikafverus or zirtafaltha is expressed by Nehemias. Againe it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the seuenth yeare of his raigne ( wherein this marriage must have beene celebrated ) came not neare to Sula. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proue that none of them could be Ahafbuerofh, it is enough to fay, that Mardocheus having been carried from Hierusalem captine, with Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was valikely to 20 have lived vnto their times.

But of this Artaxernes it is true, that he lived in Sula, raigned from India to A. thiopia, lived in peace, was contemporarie with loiskim the high Priest; and further hee had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Agyptians in that seuenth yeare of his raigne; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Roiall feast, as is described in the beginning of the booke of Hester. This is the fumme of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Hefters storic by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who addes the authorities of Infephus, affirming the fame and of Philo, giving to Mardochaus eighteene yeares more than I/au the Patriarch lived, namely one hundred fourescore and eighteene yeares in all, which ex- 20 pire in the fine and thirtieth yeare of this Artanernes, if wee suppose him to have beene carried away captine, being a Boy of ten yeares old.

d. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian Warre.

Vt it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently profecuting their civill warres, fuffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this £gyptian ex- 40 pedition being come to nought. Soone after this the Lacedemonians vndertooke the warre called, Sacred, recourred the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and deliuered both to the Inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the fame, and gaue it in charge to the Phoeians. In the meane while the banished Baotians reentred their owne Land, and mastred two of their owne Townes possest by the Athenians, which they foone recoursed against from them: but in their returns towards Athens the Ba otians, Eubwans, and Locreans, (Nations oppress by the Athenians) fet vpon them with fuch resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all flaine or taken, whereby the Baotians recovered their former libertie, restoring to the A berians their prisoners. The Handers of Eubau tooke such courage vponthis, 50 that they repolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians ( who first left the Laced amonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now wearie of their yoke, had slaine the Athenian Garrisons, and joyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speeds, but ere he could recouer Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plistoanax, the sonne of Paulanias, had inuaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Perioles went on with his first intent and recoursed Enbasa. Finally, the Athenians beganne to treate of peace with the Peloponnefians, and yeelded to deliuer up all the places which they held in the Countrie of Peloponne fus: and this truce was made for thirtie yeares. After fixe of these yeares were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Milelyans against the Samians) inuaded Sames by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the citizens were forct to yeeld themto felues vpon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breake downe their owne walls, to pay the charge of the watre, and to restore whatfoeuer had beene taken by themselves, or by their practise, from the athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian Warre; whereof I. haue gathered this Briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie yeares after the flight of Nerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell : I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly theeltate of the Countrie at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, vpon which all the reft had most dependance.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

Vpon what termes the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, flood, at the beginning of the Peloponnelian Warre.

ERCE was neuer united under the government of any one Prince or Estate; vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persian, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subjection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gonerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates. notwithstanding the power of the Mucedonians, to whom they did yeeld obedience no otherwise than as to fuch, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Perfi-an warre(deemed the General quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honor of the victorie, to their owne vse and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards raigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authoritie, that all Greece was by them brought under fuch obedience, as differed little from fertitude; very 30 few excepted, who could hardly, fometimes with armes, and fometimes with gifts, preserue their libertie; of whom the Lacedamonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserved best the plague of tyrannie, having first given occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrie by perpetuall Warre. For untill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other fide, and fo gaue beginning to the Peloponnejian war (the effects whereof in true citimation ccafed not before the time that Philip had ouer-mastred all, for a fmuch as every conclufion of one warre afforded henceforth matter to some new distraction of the whole Countrie) the warres, commenced betweene one Citie of Greece and an other, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controuerfies were foone decided, either by the authoritie of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Councell of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedamonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the affurance of victorie.

These Lacedamonians had lived about foure hundred yeares under one forme of 10 Gouernement, when the Pelaponnefian warre beganne. Their education was only to practife feates of Armes; wherein they to excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equall portion of the common field, which fufficed to maintaine him in fuch manner of life as they wied. For braueric they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinarie meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They vied money of yron, whereof they could not be couctous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Veopian-like, faue that they yied no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glorie of 20 their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrarie to this. For they fought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit; they yied mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part llanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policie, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweene these two people was very much. The Athenians were cager and violent, fuddaine in their conclusions, and as hastie in the execution; The Laceda- 30 monians very flow in their deliberations, full of grauitie, but very refolute, and fuch as would in cold bloud performe what the Atherians did viually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe that the Lacedemonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and affured, that fought honour and not riches, whereas the Athenians were followed by fuch as obeyed them perforce, being held in ftraight subjection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xernes had inuaded Greece, pretending only a quarrell to Athens. For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the Towne of Athens could not bee defended against his great Armie of seuenteene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Nauie, and (affifted by the other Grecians) overthrew the fleet 49 of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfitted by them, and the Greekes, who all ferued under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mightie in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekiff Scas vinder their obedience; impoling upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persian; though indeede they imploied their forces chiefly, to the conqueft of fuch Ilands, and hauen-Townes, of their owne Countrimen, as flood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedemonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to bee made farre from home. But afterwards perceiuing the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jelousie, and were very apt to quarrell with 50 them; but much more willing to breede contention betweene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plateans, when they of Platea repaired to Sparta for fuccour, they found there no other aide, than this aduife, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their Neighbours of Thebes. But it proued otherwise; for their force was now fo great, that all fuch occasions did only serue to encrease their honour and puissance.

How Sparta and Athens entred into Warre.

CHAP. S. S. 2.

Euerthelesse many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperities and maintayning the weaker Townes against the stronger, incroched apec upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Cerinthian; were muchintaged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who defired to increase their fleet by adioyning that of Coreyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Counthians thereby impeached of that reuenge which else they would have to taken. Now howfocuer it were fo, that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed upon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparsa so vehement, that (though with much a-doe) they concluded to redresse by warre the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the Gods; whereto having for answere, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they beganne to deale plainely, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the Estate of Athens, should be set at libertie; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the 30 A:hensans, should be ereversed. This last point they so carnestly pressed, that if they might obtaine it they promifed to ablift from their purpose of making

This they defired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by feeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entring into a warre, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to vnder-goe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole defire that all Greece should take notice, how farre they were from seare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both fides very ftrongly, all that was needfull to the 40 Warre; wherein the Lacedamonians were Superiour, both in number and qualitie, being affifted by most of the Cities in Greece; and having the generall favour, as menthat pretended to fet at libertie fuch as were oppressed; but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all prouisions, of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held; and afterward found of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soone grow wearie, and are not cafily affembled.

d. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

He first and second yeares expedition was very grieuous to the Citie of thens. For the Fields were waited, the I rees cut downe; the Countrie people driven to flie, with their Wives, Children, and Cattaile, into the Towne; whereby a mod furious pestilence grew in the Citie, fuch as before they had neither felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the renolt of the Myttlemians, in the Ile of Lesbos, and the fiege of Plates to their confederated Citie, which they durit not aductture to raife, belides fome fmall ouerthrowes received. The Lace themonians affembling as great forces as they could raife out of Feloponne five, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrie of A:1161, and therein abide, vntill victualls beganne to faile, wasting and destroying all thinges round about : The Gouernours of the Athenians would not fuffer the people to iffue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies; but vied to fend a fleet into Peloponnefus, which wasted as fait all the Seacoast of their Enemies, whilest they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponneflans being the stronger by Land, wanne the Towne of Platea, which wanted refeue; the Athenians likewife being more mightie by Sea, did fubdue Atytilen 20 which had rebelled, but could not be fuccoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that Warre, the Lacedemonians beganne to perceive how vnfit they were to deale with fuch enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to fuch harme as they themselves might, and did receive. Their Confederates beganne to let forward very flowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athens was plentifully relieued with all necessaries, which came by Sea from the Hands that were subject vnto that estate; and therefore these inuaders tooke small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mightie Citic, or in walting a forfaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilest afflicted. 30

ò. IIII.

Wherefore they beganne to fet their care to build a firong Nauie, wherein they had little good fuccesse, being easily vanquished by the Atherians, who both had more and better thips, and were fo skillfull in Sea-fights, that a few Veffells of theirs

durst vindertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

Of the great loffe which the Spartans received at Pylus.

Mong other losses which the Spartums had self by Sea, they received 40 at Pflus a very sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenium ships bound for Coreyrs, wasting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Leconia, and all the halfe lile of Peleponness, was by contrarie windes detained at Prilw, which is a ragged Promontorie, Joyning to the maine, by a straight necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Hand offeste than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good barbour for ships, the force of weather being borneost by the head-Land and Isle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in hast they might; and what was wanting in their artificial sortification, was supplied by the natural strength and site of the place. By holding this peece of ground, and hauen, they reasonably expected many aduantages against their enemies. For the Countrie adiopying was inhabited by the Assignment, who in ancient time had held very strong and cruell warre with Spata; and though quite subdued they were held in straight subsection, yet was not the old hatted so extinguished, that by the neare neighbourhood and affiltance of the Athenians, it might not bee reur ued, Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedamonians, and as many of their bond-flaues as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylus, and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this hauen, lying ailmost in the midway betweene them and Concyra, make them able to fur-round all Peleponne [12:, and wait it at their pleafure. The newes of these doings at Pylus, drew the Peloponnes ans thither in all half out of Attica, which they had entred a few dates before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Nato nie, to recouer this peece, which how bad a neighbour it might proue in time, they well forefaw, little fearing the grieuous loffe at hand, which they there in few cares received. For when they in vaine made a generall affault on all sides, both Ly Sea and Land; finding that finall Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the hauen, placing fourchundred and twentie choice menallofthem, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leades into the Port; but so narrow, that only two ships in front could enter betweene the Isle and Pylus; likewise but seuen or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, betweene the Hand and the Maine, Ha-could enter at once by the further channell, betweene the Iland and the Maine. Hauing this taken order to llint up this new Towne by Sea, they fent part of their fleet to teleth wood, and other fluffe, wherewith to fortifier ound about, and block up the speccon all tides. But in the meane feafon, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylia, returned thirther, and with great courage entring the haven, did breake and linke manie of their Enemies veffells; tooke flue, and infored the refidue to runne them felies a ground.

Now was the Towne fecure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as loft.

Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the camp (as was their custom in great dangers) to adulfe what were best for the publike safetie; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the He, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenisms a-30 bout peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedemonians should deliuer up all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Towne. nor the Athenian; against the camp: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Fleih, should bee daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the lland fecretly: That the Athenians should carrie the Laced amonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them back, at whose returns the truceshouldend, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one points should be held veterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Palaponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The 40 Embassadors comming to Athens, were in opinion, that as they themselves had begunne the warre; so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedamonians did fue to them for peace, admining them to make an end of warre, whilest with such reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation : For in stead of concluding upon cuen termes, or defiring of meete recompence for loffe fullained; the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to bee restored to them, which had beene taken from them by the Lacedemonians long before this warre beganne, refusing likewise to continue the treatie of peace, vnlesse the Spartans which were in the Ile, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassa-50 dours returned without effect, at which time the truce being ended, it was defired of the Athenian Captaines that they should, according to their couenant, restore the ships, which had beene put into their handes. Whereto answere was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, alf should bee held void; now, (said the Athenians) yee have assaulted our Garrisons,

and thereby are we acquited of our promife to restore the ships. This and the like friuolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so farreo. uer-weighed honour, that better answere none could be got. Then were the Latedamonians driven to vie many hard meanes, for convenance of victualls into the Ifle: which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prifoners to Athens, where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesians next inuaded Astica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Aibenians hope) fell vpon them; the Lacedemonians were now fo farre from wasting Attica, that they suffered their owne Countrie to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendeuous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

How the Lacedamonians hardly, and to their great disaduantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

Herefore they indeuoured greatly to obtaine peace; which the Athemass would not hearken who. For they were so puffed vp with the 20 continuance of good fuccesse, that haung sent a few bands of meninto Siedle, to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Stellans quarrells; when afterward they heard that the differences in that He were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meerely through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (belides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it felfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnefus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disafters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they loft at Amphipolis, Cleon, and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedemonian forces, were both 30 flaine; which two had most beene adversaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedamoniums, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Nauie which they had received at Pylus, were faine to proceede lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently defirous to conclude the businesse, cre Fortune by any new fauour should reviue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a confideration of their present estate, that viged them to bring the treatieof peace to good and speedie effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and readie to fall on them, which vnleffe they compounded with the Athenians, they 40 knew not how to avoide. The effate of Argos, which had ancient enmitte with them, was now, after a truce of thirtie yeares well-nigh expired, readie to take the benefit of their present troubles, by ioyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Spirta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedamonians could euer farre prevaile vponit, when they had little else to doe. This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by wasting the Territorie of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue been ended, whereby not only the Athenians should have been brought to 50 good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the warre was under taken, haue beene fo firmely knit to the Lacedemonians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argines, to their owne fortunes. But now the vanitie of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in readic money, and meanes

to raife more, were able to fecure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harme, that the Peloponnelians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Nauie, could doe vnto them, yea as Masters of the Sea, to wearie them out, as in effect alreadie they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many loffes had fo wearied and incenfed them. Wherefore the Lacedamonians were glad to vie the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much a-doe they procured, as feemed equall and catie; but were indeede impossible to be performed, and therefore all their trauaile was little effectuall.

The reflictution of priloners and places taken being agreed upon; it fell out by 10 The return more prince and prince first. These had won more townes upon lot, that the Laced amonians should rettore first. These had won more towness upon the lot of the laced from the prince had been compared to the laced from the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not wonne absolutely. For they had restored some Townes to fuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; fome, and those the most, they had set at libertie (as reason required) which had opened their gates vato them, as to their friends and deliuerers, and not compelled them to break in a chemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands. bar had been erendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to give fome fatisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had got-20 ten in the warre; as for the reft, they promifed more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselues into the handes of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by reuolting, notwithstanding whatsoener articles were drawen, and concluded, for their fecuritie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those thinges which on their part were required; fo that reftoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the reit, vitill fuch time as they might receive the fuil fatisfaction, according to the agreement. But before fuch time as these diffi-

20 culties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedamonians entred into a more ftraight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offenfine and defenfine with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argines, who being (asthey thought) likely to have fued for peace at their hands, as foone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did shew themselves plainly vnwilling to give care to any fuch motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian fuccour, they should make fure worke, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deferring in the late warre, or found fo trouble some, that their enmittee (if perhaps they durit let it appeare) were little worfe than friendihip. It bred great

40 jeloulie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive fuch a conjunction betweene two fo powerfull Signories: especially one clause threatning enery one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a fecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceipts. of fubduing the whole Countrie, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For belides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall confent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought fo ftrongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed Enemies, was violently throwne upon the Lacedamonians their unjust friends: whereby it came passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe fivay in Greece, might have beene abandoned

50 to the discretion of their Enemies, as alreadie in effect they were, had the Enemies wifely vied the advantage.

Of the negotiations, and practifes, held betweene many States of Greece. by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

He admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as weretittable, and able to make way through all impediments, had been fo excefline, that when by some finisher accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not sounding very to honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happensylually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it wasneuer thought that any Lacedamonian would have endured to lay downe his weapons and yeeld himfelfe prisoner, nor that any mistortune could have beene so great, as should have drawne that Citie to releeue it felfe otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were fome of especiall marke, being ouer-laied by enemies, in the lland before Pylus, had rather chosen to line in captinitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it selfe, flicking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred fuch anguilh in that Estate, as vtterly wearying the accultomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and 12 fecke to refresh it felfe by diffnonourable eafe: then did not only the Corint bian; and Thebans beginne to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other leffer Cities joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their cies vpon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose abilitie, to doe much, they conceined a strong beliefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankinde. We curioutly fearch into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting to our felues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuicat the greatnesse of Athens dayly encreasing) the Laced emonians had entred into the present warre. But these Corinthians did only murmure at the peace, alleadging as gricuances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans who during the time of warre, had procured some part of the Arcsdians to become their followers, and forfake their dependency upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discouer themselues; seare of revenge to come working more effectually, than indignationat things already past. The Argines feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their failes, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could standyn-40 der; giuing for that purpose varotwelue of their citizens, a full and absolute commillion to make alliance betweene them and any free cities of Greece (Athensand Sparia excepted) without any further trouble of propounding energy particular bufinesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Pelopennelus following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wifest way to doe as the most did. What inconvenience might arise to them by these courses, the Lacedamonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embaffadors to stoppe the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischiefe had beene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Coronbians a very rough disposition, with a grauity expressing the opinion which they had conceined of their present advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into the alliance with Arges, to fend their Agents to them, in whose presence they gave audience to the Lacedemonians; the purport of whose Embassie was

this: That the Corinibians, without breach of their oath, could not for fake the alliance, which they had long fince made with Sparta, and that reason did as well binde them to holde themselues contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their auncient confederacy, for a fmuch as it had been agreed betweene the Spartans and their affociates, that the confent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athens) should binde the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no Diuine impediment withflood them. Heereunto the Corinthans made answere, that the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had loft many places, without to promition of reflicution, & that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, for a smuch as they had lworne vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against athers, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly fuffer them to fall againe into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reafon and religion to vie all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oth was no leffe to be accounted a Diuine impediment, than were pettilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vindertaken. As for the alliance with Argo, they faid that they would doe as they should finde cause. Having dismitted the Embassadors 20 with this answere, they made all hast to joyne themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; fo that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themsclues, the Thebans and Megarians being also upon the point to have entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were divers, which caused this halfile confluence of fudden friends to Argos, it folikewife came to paffe that the friendship it selfe, such as it was, had much divertitie both of inceritie and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lace demonians; as the Mantingans and Eleans: thefe did firmly betake themfelues to the Argues, in whom they knew the fameaffection to be inveterate; others did only hate the peace concluded; and thefe would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argines in warre, yet rather the 30 Argines in war than the Lacedemonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the focietie of the Argines, as they had done a but the different formes of gouernement, vied in Thebes and Argos, cauled the Thehanes to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incurre the danger of innouation, by joyning withfuch as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This butinetle hauing ill succeeded, the Corinibians beganne to bethinke themfelues of their owne danger, who had not fo much as any truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for warre. They fought therefore to come to some temporarie agreement with the Albenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had 40 dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment, with one citie that shewed against them more stomach than force; but gaue them to vnderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made, with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loath to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they defired; but into private confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre without the Heerein, as in many other paffages, may clearely be seene the great advantage 50 which absolute Lords have as well in peace as in warre, ouer such as are served by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any one Signorie, that hath beene so constantly followed as Sparta was, by fo many States, and fome of them litic inferior to it felfe, being all as free: whereas contrariwife, the Athenians had lately, and by compultive meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants.

But in performance of conditions agreed you, the Athenius were able to make their wordes good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and gining by fish places as were agreed you or of which the Leacheniums could doe neither the one nor the other. For fish Towness a their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not be reitored without their confent, which had them in prefent policilion, and particularly the Towne of Paulic, which the Thebarsheld, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Leacheniums (who earneilly delired); that by reithitution thereof vinto the Athenium, as earneilly demanding it, them folius might recover Pylan) vinelle they would agree to make a private alliance with Thebas; which thereupon they were laine to doe, though knowing it to bee

The Lacedemonians having broken one article of the league made between them & the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give vp the Towne of Panacte, till first they had vtterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was fought to have beene exculed by the Lacedamonian Embassadours, who comming to Achens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had beene detained at Thebes; hoped with gentle wordes to salue the matter; faying, That from henceforth no enemie to Athens should nesslein Panacle, for it was destroied. But these Embassadours had not to deale with tame 20 fooles. For the Athemans told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but vied fuch base collusion as stood not with their honour : having made private alliance with the Thebans; having destroied a Towne that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by warre, to make good the covenants of the late concluded peace. Hercupon they difmiffed the Embaffadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deedes to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeare, in Sparta; and Alcibiades a powerfull yong Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though de- 30 firing to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to bee rendred to them by couenant, especially Pylus that had so forely troubled them. Alcibiades whose Nobilitie, riches, and fauour, with the people, made him defire warre, as the meanes, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable emploiment, vsed all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, whilest the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendred ought face their prisoners, and pretence enough to vse that advantage of breaking the peace, by reafon that the Laced commians (though indecde against their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retaine Pylus, and to performe nothing that the Lucdamonian: (hould, and might require, vntill 40 they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereunto they were bound, euen to the vtmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who hauing alreadie done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delinerie of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedie beginning of open warre, sent privily to the Argines, and gave them to vnderstand how fitly the time served for them to affociate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them fecuritie against all Enemies.

The Argines vpon the first confluence of many Estates who their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should have had the conduct of all Greece against the Archans, robbing Sparta of that honour, as shaving illvsed it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disabilitie. But these suddening apprehensions of vaine joy, were suddainely changed into as vaine stare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately been conceined of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Cerin-thans had fought fecuritie from Athenisand when a falle rumour was noticed abroad, that Athenis, Thebets, and Sparks, were come to a full agreement vpon all points of difference; then beganne the Argines to let fall their creits, and fue for peace vnto the Lacestannanis, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauitie, and were not ouer-halfiet o acceptit. At this time, and in this perturbation, the mellage of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argines, which were not now confoling how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to faue themfelues. Wherefore they fine away prefently to Athens, their owne Emballiadours, accompanied with the Athenisms and Eleans, to make a league offentiue, and defendine, between

Of this businesse the Lacedemonians knew not what to thinke : for well they faw, that fuch a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were delirous to present it; but to keepe the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was alreadie done, than flood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wisest way, having done so much, not to stick upon a little more, but rather by giuing full satisfaction to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to bee valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution premailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens with full comission to make an end of all controuersies, did earnestly labour in the Coun-20 cell-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying; that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recourie of Panacle: concerning which Towne, or any other bulinesse, that it much grieued the Lacedamoniam, to fee things fall out in fuch wife as might give to the Athenians cause of difpleasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters even betweene them; to which purpose they shewed that themseives had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might bee restored vnto them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argines might be called a-fide. Fanourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their wordes good. But all 30 this faire likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the suddaine, by the practise of Acibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedemonian Embassadours, perswaded them well of his friend thip towards their Citie, and adulfed them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Communaltie of Athens, least the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie, and yeeld to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to varcasonable conditions. The Embassadours beleeved him, and fashioned their tale in the assembly of the people, as hee had aduised them. Herevpon the same Alexhades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inneighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were 40 come to Athens for none other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthning themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argines and their Adherents to their owne alliance, as (contrarie to their oath) aireadic they had the Thehans. The people of Athers, whom a pleafing errand would hardly have fatisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedemonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill beene feconded with good performance) were now fo incenfed with the double dealing of the Embassiadours, and the strong perswasions of Acabiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Arges. Yet for the present so farre did Ni-Gist, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, preuaile with them, that the bulinesse was put off, till he himselse with other Embassadours might fetch a 50 better answere from Sparta.

It may feeme a great wonder, how so poore a tricke of Alabiates was able to carrie a matter of such importance, when the Soprim Embassadours might haue cast the loade vpon his owne shoulders, by discouering the truth.

CHAP. S.S.S. of the Historie of the World.

But the gravitie which was vivally found in the Lacedemonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handformely against so nimble a wit; and they might well have been thought entrusty men, had they protested themselves such as would fav and vn-fav for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a fowre meffage to deliner at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the reft, that the Lacedamonians thould take the paines to rebuild Panacte, and thould immediately renounce their alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand that otherwife the Athemans, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argues, and their Adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to forfakethe 10 Thehans, affured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was fulfered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Maiss their honourable friend, who would not feeme to have effected nothing) fweare a-new to keepe the articles of the league betweene them and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadours, a new league was made between the Athenians, Argines, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedamonians were passed over with filence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacie did bend it false chiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Laced emonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recouered nothing of their owne (prifoners excepted) for defalt of reftoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late warre by misfortunes, than in fundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amitie, they had left fundrie of their old friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwife the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most of that which they loft in warre; all their gettings they had retained; and were firengthened by the acceile of new Confederates.

V I I.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

T was not long ere the Argines and their fellowes had found bufineffe, wherewith to let the Athenians on worke, and make vie of this conjunction. For prefuming upon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Spar- 40 ta to defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Spiritadid not (as principals) infest each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their feuerall friends. By these occasions the Corinthians, Bastians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, beganned new to range themselves under the Lacedemonians, and follow their enfignes. One victorie which the Lacedemonians obtained by their meere valour in a fet battaile, neare to Mantinea, against the A gine-fide, helped well to repaire their decaied reputation, though otherwise it yeelded them no great profit. The civill differtion arifing shortly after within Argos it selfe, betweene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of 59 the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded to farre as to renounce the amitie of the Athenians in expresse wordes, and forced the Mantinaans to the like. But in short space of time the multitude premailing, reverfed all this, and basing chaled away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselines to the Athenians as closely

Beside these vprores in Peloponnesius, many affaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Gre. ce, and likewile in Maccion, to the Athenians; whose forces and readinesse for execution, preuented some thinges, reuenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athemans wanting matter of quarrell, and the Lacedamonians growing wearie, they beganne to be quiet, retaining Hill that enmitie in their hearts, which they had fufficiently discouered in effects, though not to as yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

Q. VIII.
The Athenians fending two flecis to facke Stratufe, are put to flight and viticily disconsisted.

Vring this intermission of open warre, the Athenians re-intertained meir hopes of fubduing sieit, whither they fent a fleet so mightic as s. acuer was let forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to fogreat an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiales Author of that wing, and one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driven to banish himselfe, for feare of such judgement, as else he was like to haue under-gone, among the incensed people; partly by the inuation which the Lacedemonians made upon Attica, whileft the forces of that State were to rarre from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Persia, who Supplied the Peloponne sans with money.

Neither was the successe of thinges in Sicilia such, as without helpe from Athens, could give any tikelihood of a good end in that warre. For although in the begin-30 ning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they be sieged Siracuje, the chiefe Citie of the lland and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtayning the better in fundrie battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieued with strong aide from Peloponneliss, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the works on all fides, in fuch wife that their fleet was thut up into the hauen of Siracufe, and could not iffue out.

As the Ashenian affaires went very ill in Sial, so did they at home stand upon hard termes, for that the Lacedemonians, who had beene formerly accustomed to make wearifome yearely journies into Atties, which having pilled and foraged, they returned home; did now by counfell of Alcibrales, who feeking renenge you his 40 owne Citizens was fled vnto them, fortifie the Towne of Deceles, which was neare to Athens, whence they ceafed not with daily excursions to harrie all the Countrie round about, and fometimes give alarme vnto the Citie it felfe.

In these extremities, the peruerse obstinacie of the Athenians was very strange; who leaving at their backs, and at their owne dores, an enemie little leffe mightie than themselues, did yet send forth an other fleet into sieil, to inuade a people no leffe puiffant, which neuer had offended them.

It often happens that prosperous euent makes soolish counsaile seeme wiser than + it was, which came to passe many times among the A'henisms, whose vaine corceipts Pallas was faid to turne vnto the best. But where vnsound adulfe finding bad proofe, 50 is obstinately pursued, neither Pallar nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second fleet of the A benians, which better might have served to conney home the former, that was defeated; after fome attempts made to final! purpole against the Siraculans, was finally (together with the other part of the Na uie, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the hauen of Sire Iii 2 case, whereby the campe of the Athenian; ytterly deprined of all benefit by Sea, either for incoon or departure, was dritten to breake vp and flie away by Land, in which flight they were oner-taken, routed, and quite onerthrowne in fuch wife that fearce any main eleaped.

This muchiele well descruedly fell you the Athenans, who had wickedly condemned into exile sopheales and Pilinanna Generalls, formerly lent into that lie, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Seal, whereas indiede there was not any meanes or polibilitie to have made warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Agrie, who had the chiefe command in this whappie enterpisse, did rather choose to hazard the ruine of his Countrie by the loss of that Armie, wherein to consisted into lesse than all the power of Aben's, than to adventure his owne consisted in the lesse than all the power of the seasy than to adventure his owne consisted in the lesse than all the power of the seasy than to be due to the same defence that the first tence of ludges before his triall resoluted to condemne him, by retiring from Sussesses, when writedome and necessitie required it. For (said he) they shad sine some one consistent of large, when wiselesses were not be required in the said of the less than the said of the less the said of the lesses and danger be well convented to frame their tales to the plusses of the lesse and insoletin mall anger be well convented to frame their tales to the plusses of the less and insoletin mall.

This refolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of 20 an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth, and to measure honour or dilhonour by the affurance of his well-informed conference, rather than by the malicious report and centure of others) yet it may be excufed; fince he had before his cies the injustice of his people; and had well underflood that a wicked fencence is infinitely worfe than a wicked last, as being L. a president and patterne, whereby oppression beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Ther fore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was fuch, as a contlant man could not cafily have over-maftered; but when afterwards the Armie, hauing no other expectacion of fafetie than the faint hope of a feeret flight, he was fo terrified with an Eclipfe of the Moone, happening when they were about to 36 dislodge, that he would not consent to have the camp breake vp till four and twentie daies were past. His timorousnesse was euen as foolish and ridiculous, as theissue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the power of the Heauens, and the course of Nature, would be as vnjust as his Athenians, or might pretend leffe cuill to the flouthfull, than to fuch as did their best. Neither doc I thinke that any Astrologer can alleage this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise than as the folic of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cassiu the Reman, he, who flew Juliu: Celar, imitated this superstition of Wieins, be had furely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retyring the broken remainder of Craffus his Armie descated by 40 the Parthian Archers was aduifed, upon fuch an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answere that he stood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So aduenturing rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon carel, hee made fuch a fafe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and giue a faire example to that good rule,

Thus we fee that God, who ordinarly workes by a concatenation of meanes, depriues the Gouernours of understanding, when hee intends cuill to the multitude; and that the wickednessed in just men is the readic meane to weaken the vertue of 50 shose who might have done them good.

φ. I X.

Of the troubles where into the State of Athens fell, after the great loffe of the Fleet, and Armie, in Sicilia.

He Iosse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accompted a very little lesse calamite to that is state, than was the subscription of the walls, when the Citic about steen yeares after was taken by Lylander. For now beganne the Subjects of the Athenian Listate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced under their owners.

A therefore there held out; some for feare of greater inconnenence were feat at illustric, promiting only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been etheir Subjects; others hauing a kind of libertie oftered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very winclationably, that the principal men of Athens being wearied with the peoples infolencie, tooke upon them to change the forme of that Lifate, and bring the gouernement into the handes of a few. 10 which purpose confipring with the Captaines which were abroad, they can fed them to fer up the forme 20 of an Aristocratic in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the neane time,

20 oran Arthod and the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meetne time, fome that were most likely to withit and this innovation, being slaine at .athous, the Commonaltie were so dismaid that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number of the league. In this generall searche Majedice of .tthous was vumped by source hundred men, who observing in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded uppon by the greater part of voices: but the thinges propounded were only such as were first allowed in private among themselves, neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than only to approue and give consent, for whose ever pressumed any 30 further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the mur-

30 further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murider. By the fe meanes were many decrees made, all tending to the effablishment of this new Authoritie, which neuerthelesse indured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was at the sle of $\int_{amer}$ is dalatogether detestithes dealings of the foure hundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they recoked. Alcibiade out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Passim King had promised vnto the Letechnomians, were by Tislaphen net his Lieutenairs, made vnprositable, through the slow and bad performance. Activities had at the first beene very well entertained in Sparts, whileth his seruice done to that State was not growne to be the object of enuie. But when it appeared that in counfaile and good performance he so faire excelled all the Latecknomians, that all their good fucceffe was afcribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his vertue; efpecially Agis one of their Kings, whole wife had fo fat yeelded her felfe to the loue of this Alberian, that among her inward friends thee could not forbeare to call her yong child by his name. Hereupon order was taken that Aleibade flould be killed out of the way. But he difcouering the Sparian trecherie, conucighed himfelfe vnto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautic, sweet conversation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roies affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings tressures and forces in those parts. Then beganne he to adulte Tissaphernes, not so farre 50 forth to assist the Lacedamonians, that they should quite overthrow the Seate of Assistant the to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, where by all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsails hee made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the only fauourice of fo great a Potentate) hee plaied his owne game, procuring his restitution. At length his banithment being repealed by the Armic, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the foure hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile the

Souldiers to the Goueinors; or at least to discretcheir heat an other way, and turne it vpon the common bnemie. Some of the foure hundred approved his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie whereof they were partakers, partly because they faw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being leile regarded by the gett of their companions, than stood with their good liking, fought to acquit themselves of it as honeity as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to ob-charities and the greatnesse of their Citie, if they might, but if this could not be they did rather with to preferue their owne power, or fafetie at least, than the good F-flate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made fundric ouertures of peace to the Lagedamonians, deliring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to bee trusted than the wavering multitude; especially confidering that the Citic of Sparta was gouerned by an Arijiocratie, to which forme they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the four hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedamonians, were kept as secret as might be.

For the Citie of Aihens, hoping, without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was much more auerfe, trufting well that the discord of the Athenians (not voknowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though norther prefently) came to passe. And upon this hope King des did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, hee received fome small losses. Likewise the Nauic of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citic, but feeing no likelihood of fuccesse, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have beene regarded, than in this their decaied estate. Yet it seemes, without any disparagement to their wisedome, they should any terrour of the warre. For the diffention within the walls might foone have done more hurt than could be received from the Fleet or Armie without, which indeede gaue occasion to set the Citizens at vnitie, though it lasted not very long.

The foure hundred, by meanes of these troubles, were faine to resigne their autho-ritie, which they could not now hold, when the people having taken armes to repell forraine enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed them selves from fuch as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of gouernement a full restitution of the sourraigne command vnto the people, or whole body of the Citic, but only to fine thousand; which companie the four hundred (when their taine peace of the Lacedemonians, defiring chiefly to maintaine both their owne au-diers desire.

How ALCIBIADES wanne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and againe deposed.

His establishment of thinges in the Citic, was accompanied with some good fuccessein the warres. For the Lacedemonians were about the fame time ouerthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet which had remained at Samos, to which Sicibiades afterwards joyning fuch forces as he could raife; obtained many victories, Before the Towne of Abydus, his arrivall with eighteene ships gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; hee ouerthrew and otterly destroicd the fleet of the Lacedemonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus, and Perinthus, made the Seigmbrians ranfome their Citie, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon letters were lent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the diffreile of the Armie in these few wordes: Alis lost; MINDARVS is flaine; the Souldiers want vi Tualls; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedemonians in fight by Land at 20 Chalcedon, tooke Selymbria; befieged and wanne Byzantium, now called Conflantinople, which even in those daies was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citie. Hereuppon hereturned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Nauie.

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and hee driuen to banish himselse againe; only because his Lieutenant, contrarie to the expressecommand of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmefull than the first; and the losse which thereupon they received, was (though more heavie 30 to them, yet) leffe to be pittied of others, than that which enfued ypon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to advertitie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of fuch danger had cast out him that should have repaired their weake estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after injurie received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alabiades, arrived at the fleet, hee presented battaile to Lt sander the Lacedemonian Admirall, who was not so consident upon his former victorie, as to undertake A'cibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteene) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had beene under his Lieutenant. But when the 40 decree of the people was published in the Nauie, then did Aleibiades with-draw himselfe to a Towne vpon Hellesport , called Bizanthe , where hee had built a

The battaile at Arginuse, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

Fter this time the Athenians, receiving many loffes and discomfitures, were driven to flie into the Hauen of Atytelene, where they were straightly belieged both by Land and Sea. For the railing of this siege necessitie inforced them to man all their Vessells, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile authoritie beganne) had pretended to take vnto them as affiftants; herein feeming 40 to doe little wrong or none to the Commonaltic, who feldome affembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeede into the handes of so many, it was soone agreed that Alcibiades and his Companions should bee recalled from exile, and that the Armie at Sames should bee requested to vndertake the gouernement: which was forthwith reformed according to the Soul-

was fought at Arginufa, where Callieratidas, Admirall of the Lacedamonians, looting the honor of the day, preferued his owne reputation by dying valiantly in the fight It might well have beene expected, that the ten Captaines, who joyntly had command in chiefe over the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies feruice, and so happie a victorie, haue received great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwife they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if wilifully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and funke, to be cast away, when by appointing fome Veffells to take them vp, they might have faved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very just answere; That they purfuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, under fulficient men, to faue those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplified, it was, because a tempestarifing about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse availed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who faid, That he him felfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had beene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to delire of the people reuenge of their deaths upon the Captaines. It was very strange that, vpon such an acculation maintained with so flender enidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrie should bee onerthrowne. But their enemies had so incenfed the rascall multitude, that no mandurst absolue them, faue only Socrates the wife and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one 20 had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doc relected by other vessells in the storme : but the Captaines which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this judgement was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and percerted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of injustice; but the divine justice was not a fleepe, nor would be so deluded.

ð. XII.

The battaile at Agos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnessian Warre.

He Pelepannelim Rect vnder Lyfander, the yeare next following, having foured the £gean Sea, entred Helefpont, where (landing souldiers) it belieged and tooke the Towne of Lampfauu. Hereupponall the Nauico of £thens, being an hundred and fourefore fails, made thitter in halte, but finding Lampfauu taken before their comming, they put in at Seises, where having refreshed themselves, they failed to the Riucr called, £ges-Patames, which is (as we might name it) Gastes-breeke, or the 42 Riuer of the Gastes, being on the Continent, opposite to Lampfauus and there they cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lyfander, who rode at £ampfaus in the harbour. The next day after their arrivall they prefented fight vnto the Pelepane-fam, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned against to £ges-Painnes, and thus they consinued fine dases, brauing euery day the Ememie and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards curning.

The Castle of Acidisades was not farre from the Nauie, and his power in those places was such as might have greatly availed his Countrimen, if they could have made vse offit. For he had waged Mercinaries, and making watre in his ownename vpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much yoreputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired wno them, and shewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not some fore-see and preventit. For they lay in a roade subject to every some processing the support of the processing the support of t ry weather, neither neare enough to any Towne wherethey might furnish themfaues with necessaries, nor so farre off as had beene more expedient. Selfus was the next Market- Towne; thither both Souldiers and Marriners reforted, flocking away from the Nauie enery day, as soone as they were returned from brauing the Enemie. Therefore A abisales willed them either to he at Seilus, which was not farre off, or at the least to consider better how neare their enemie was, whose scare proceeded rather from obedience to his Cenerall, than from any cowardife. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date Hadit not beene for these opprobrious wordes, hee could (as hee told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedemonians, either to fight vpon vnequall termes, or vtterly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that hee might fo haue done, by transporting the light-armed Thraci-ns his Consederates, and others his Followers over the Straights, who affaulting the Pelaponnefians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leave their saips to the mercie of he Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counfaile no better than hath beene rehearfed, hee left them to their fortune, which how eaill it would bee he did prognosticate.

Islander all this whiledefending himfelfe by the advantage of his Hauen, was 20 not carefelfe in looking into the demeanour of the Athenius. When they departed, his manner was to fend forth fome of his fwitefit Veffells after them, who obfruing: seir doings, related vinto him what they had fene. Therefore vinderitaning in what carefulfe failtion they romed vp and downe the Countrie; hee kept all his mena-boord after their departure, and the fift day gaue effectail charge to his Scours, That when they perceined the Athenium difembarking, as their customews, and walking towards Schos, they should forthwith returne, and hang vpabrazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lylan.er win, in a readineffe, made all freedethat through of Oares could give, to Eggs-Patamas, where he found vegor yf worth is enemies a boord their flips, not many nearethem, and all in great contains upon the newes of his approch.

In 6 much that the greatest industrie which the Athenian then shewed, was in the cleape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported, gauc ouer Athens as desperate, and made a long slight vitto the slic of Cyprus, all the rest were taken, and inch of the Souldiers as came in to the refue cut in pecces. *
Thu, was the Warre which had lasted seuen and twentie yeares, with variable forcess; concluded in one houre, and the glorie of Athens in such wise Eclipsed, that then seuer afterward shone againe in her perfect light.

Immediately vponthis victorie, Lylander, hauing taken in fuch Townes as readodly did yeeld vponthe first flame of his exploit, set faile for Ashem, and ioyning his forces with those of Ages and Paulsains, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Citie, which sinding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to be wonne on the suddance, heep us forth againet o Sea, and rather by terrour than violence, compelling allthe llands, and fuch Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Ashemians, to submit themselues to Sparta, beed dithereby cut off all prouisson of victualls, and other needstries, from the Citie, and inforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions. That the long walls, leading from the Towne to the Port, should be thrownedowne; That all Cities subject to their Towne to the Port, and the fields adjoyning to their Towne; And that they should keepe no more than twelve ships; That they should hold as Friends or Inemies, the same, whom the Lacedemonium did, and follow the Lacedemoniums as Leaders in the Warres.

These articles being agreed upon, the walls were throwne downe with great rejoycing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens; and not without some confuitation of delitroying the Citie, and laying waite the Land about it. Which aduife, although it was not entertained, yet were thirtie Gouetnours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompended their former infolencie and injuttice ouer their Captaines, by opprelling them with all base and intolerable flauerie.

The only small hope then remaining to the Alcibiades, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants perceiuing this, aductifed the Lacedemonians thereof, who contriued, to and (as nowe domineering in cueric quarter) foone effected his fuddaine

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedemonians abufing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew veric odious to all Greece, and by Combination of manie Cities against them, were dispossed of their high authoritic, euen in that very Age, in which they had fubdued Athens. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Epimmon as, vider whom Philip of Alicedon, Father to Alexander the Great. had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citic of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was fundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haugh 20 tie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the feuerall Estates and Signories of Greee, were growne so jealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Ladedemontans, Athenians, Argines, and Thebans, which were the mightieft, affociating themselues with the weaker partie, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrie remained rather eucoly ballanced, than well agreeing, till fuch time as Philip, and after him Alexander,

Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had beene dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassalls to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found meanes, by making vse of their factions, to bring them all into feruitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romaines prefenting them with a shew of libertie, did themselues indeede become their

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

How the affaires of Persia slood in these times.

VRING the times of this Peloponnesian Warre, and those other leffe expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably injoyed a long raigne ouer the Persians, lett it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Baftard, whom the Greeke Historians (lightly passing ouer Aerxe, the fecond, and Sogdianus, as Vlurpers, and for their thort raigne little to be regarded) place next vnto him, or to Nerves the fecond, who, and his brother Sozdianus after him (feeming to have beene the fonnes of Hefter ) held the Kingdome but one yeare betweene them, the yonger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I have faid before) to purfue the Historie of the Persians from honceforth, by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise then as they shall be eincident to the affaires of Greec. It may therefore suffice to say, That Nerves the second, being a vitious Prince, did perilhafter a moneth or two, if not by furfeit, then by treacherie of his as riotous bro. 30 ther Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he flew vnjuftly Bagorazas a principall Eunuch, and would have done as much to his brother Darius the Bastard, had not hee foreseene it, and by railing a stronger Armie than this hated King Sog dianus could leavie, seized at once you the King and Kingdome. Darius having flaine his brother, held the Empire nineteene yeares. Amyrteus of Sais an Agyptian rebelled against him, and having partly flaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe so firmely with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his posteritie, who (not withstanding the furie of their ciuil) Warres) maintained it against the Persian, all the daics of this Darius, and of his sonne Artanernes 40 Minemon. Likewise Amorges, a subject of his owne and of the Roiall bloud, being Licutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Athemians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell you the Athenians in Sicil, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Ilanders and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedemonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Nauie, without which it was impoffible to advance the warre against the State of Athens, that remained powerfull by Sea, were driven to crave his affiftance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the articles of the league 30 betweene him and them were fet downe in more precise termes, wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre joyntly vpon the Athenians, and ypon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of A/ia, which had formerly beene his, or his Predecessours, should return to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warre enfuing (of which I have alreadic spoken) herecovered all that his Grand-father and Father had loft in Aira. Likewise by affiftance of the Lacedemonians he got Amorges a-line into his handes, who was taken in the Citie of Iafus; the Athenians wanting cither force or courage to succour him. Neuertheleffe Leppt still held out against him; the cause whereof cannot bee the emploiment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece, for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his naturall enemies, what the valour of his owne Subjects was infufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Paryfatu his owne fifter, who bare vnto him (belides other children) Artaxerxes called Atte-10 mon, that is to fay, the Mindfull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the yonger, a Prince of fingular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Gyrm the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous cie vpon the doings of yong Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than besitted a Subject : for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to have taken some very sharpe course with him, had not his owne death preuented the comming of his yonger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre between ethese bretheren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, wee shall have occasion to speake some- 29 what in more conuenient place.

ð. I I.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place most convenient to shew the proceedings of the freekes, after the subversion of the walls of Athens, which gaucend to that warre called the Pelaponnessan warre, but could not free the valiappie Countrie of Greeces from civil broiles. The thirtie Gours onours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a bodie of their Law, and make a collection of fuch ancient Statutes, as were meeted to be put in practife; the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the supermeanthorite, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessitie of the times did for require it, wherein the Law being vincertaine, it was six that such men should give judgement in particular causes, to whose judgement the Lawes themselves, by which the Citie was to be cordered, were become subject. But these thirtie having so great power in their handes, were more carefull to hold it, than to descrue by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them 40 in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approued, who considered their lewed conditions, but did not withall bethinke themselues, how casie a thing it would bee vnto their thirtie men, to take away the lines of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or whateslie they liked; when condemnation without due triall and proofe had beene once well allowed. Hauing thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of gouernment, they thought it best to fortist chemselues with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needes commit for the class 50 bildhing of their authoritie. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne companie to $parts, they informed the *Lacedemonian*, that it was the full intent of the thirties, to keep the Citic free from all rebellious motions, to which purpose it behough them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the *Lacedemonian* to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a guard fent, the Captaine of which was fo well entertained by the thirde, that none of their misdeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants beganne to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, inuaded the principall men of the Citic, sending armed men from House to House, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able, to make any head against this wicked forme of gouernement: whereby there was such effusion of bloud, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) feemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His diffike of their proceedings to being openly discouered, caused his fellowes to bethinke themselues, and provide for their owne fecuritie, and his destruction, least he should make himselfe a Captain of the ascontrated (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeemehis owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens. whom they thought meetest, and gaue vinto them some part of publique authoritie, the rest they disarmed; and having thus increased their ownestrength, and weakened their opposites, they beganne a-fresh to shed the bloud, not only of their private enemies, but of fuch whose money, or goods, might inrich them, and enable them for the paiment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man vpon whose goods he should seize, putting the ow-20 ner to death. But when Theramenes yttered his detestation of so wicked intent; then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priviledge of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but hauethe accustomed triall) he tooke vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and so reduced him under the triall and sentence of that order. It was wellalleaged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans, vpon which confideration hee aduised them all to conceiue no otherwise of his case, than as of their owne, who were liable to the same forme of proceeding: but (enery man choosing rather to preserve his owne 20 life by filence, than prefently to draw vpon himselfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would neuer come neare him) the Tyrants interpreting filence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poifon.

§. III.

The conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their deposition.

Fter the death of Theramenes, the thirtie beganne to vie fuch outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For hauing three thousand (as they thought) firme vnto them, they robbed all others without feareor thame, defpoiling them of lands and goods, and cauling them to flie into banishment, for fafeguard of their lines. This flight of the Citizens procured their libertie, and the generall good of the Citie. For the banished Citizens, who were sled to Thebes, entred into consultation, and resoluted to hazard their lives in setting free the Citie of Ashem. The very thought of such a practise had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventie men, or thereabout, were the first undertakers, who with their Captaine Thrassibalus tooke Phyle, a place of strength in the Territoric of 50 Ahm. No sooner did the thirtie heare of their exploit, than sceke meanes to previent further danger; assembling the three thousand, and their Lacedemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyle, but were with some loss of their men repelled. Finding the place too strong to be taken by assault, they intended to besiege it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that fell, and other storms.

weather, against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the Ci-

tie, which about all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard, and two companies of Horse, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege.

But it was not long ere the followers of Thrafybulus were encreased from leuentie to feuen hundred, which aduentured to give charge vpon those guards, of whom they cut off aboue an hundred & twentie. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand men got entrance into Piraus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming, the thirtie had refolued to fortific the Towne of Elewine, to their owne vse, whereinto they might make an eafie retrait, and faue themselves from any suddaine perill. It may well feeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of gouernement had brought them into fuch danger, they were fo farre from feeking to obtaine mens good will, that contrariwife, to affure themselves of Eleusine, they got all of the place who could beare armes into their handes by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of justice) murthered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefs which they had alreadie done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of fafetie, than by extending their crueltie vnto all, feeing few or none were left, whom they could truft. When Thra-

Tybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were termed conspirators, had taken the Piraus, it; but in this enter prife Thrafybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were flaine to the number of feuentie, only yet the victorie feemed the greater, because Critics, & one other of the thirtie, perished in that fight.

The death of Critias, and the stout defence of Piraus, together with some exhortations vsed by Thrasybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect that the thirtie were deposed. Neuerthelesse there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirtie in their mildeedes, seared to be called to a sharpeaccount, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernement could be established. For

Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aide against Thrasybulus, and his followers, had fauourable audience, and a power fent to their affiftance, both by Land 30 and Sea, under the conduct of Lyfander, and his Brother; whom Paufanias the Spartan King did follow, railing an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedamomians. And here appeared first the jealousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta: The Baotians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had beene the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Paulanias in this expedition; alleaging

then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to affault 20

CHAP. X. Of the expedition of CYRVs the yonger.

The grounds of CYRVS his attempt against his brother.

HE matters of Greece now standing vpon such terme that no one Estate durst oppose it selfe against that of Lacedamon; yong Cyrus, brotherto Artaxernes, King of Persia, having in his fathers life time very carefully profecuted the warre against Athens, did send his mesfengers to Sparta, requelting that their love might appeare no leffe to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous warre against the Athenians. To this request, being generall, the Lacedemonians gaue a futable answere, commanding their should require of him. If Cyrus had plainely discouered himselfe, and the Lacedemonians bent their whole power to his affiftance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Perfia linould have been the recompence of his deferts, or that he periffing in battaile, as after he did, the subucrison of that Empire had forthwith enfued. But it pleased God, rather to shew unto the Greekes the waies, which under the Macedoman Enlignes, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and ope-30 ning vnto them the riches, and with all the weakenesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both defire and hope of that conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mightie Kingdome, whose houre was not yet come. The lone which Pary faits the Queene-Mother of Persia bare vnto Cyrus her yonger sonne, being seconded by the carnest sauour of the people, and readiedefires of many principall men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before beene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; hee found his elder brother Artawerves established so surely by the old Kings fauour, that it were not fafe to attempt any meanes of displanting him, by whose disfauour himselfe might 40 eafily loofe the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Afia the leffe, and hardly bee able to maintaine his ownelife. The nearest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trecherie, craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vling by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well beethought that Queene Pary fatis had obtained the inheritance of that mightie Empire. And it was very true that Pary atis had vfed the best of her endeuour to that purpose, alleaging that (which in former ages had beene much availeable to Xexxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whilest his father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was 50 acrowned King. All which not sufficing; when the most that could bee obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydin, and the parts adjoyning: then did this Tissaphernes discouer his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treafon intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true of false, very that it flood not with their oathes, to make warre against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league : but fearing, indeede, least the Lacedamonians should annexe the Territorie of Athens to their owne Demaines. It is not to bee doubted that Paufanias tooke this answere in good part. For it was nothis purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings 40 of Lysander, whom he enuied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrafybulus his partie, made a flew of warre, he finally wrought fuch meanes that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and such others, as were like to give cause of tumult, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, having with drawne themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innouation, whereupon the whole Citie rising against them, tooke their

Captaines, as they were comming to Parlie, and flew them: which done, to avoide further inconvenience, a law was made that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made, and carefully observed, the Citie returned to her former quietnesse.

Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all feruice that hee eatily believed, Cyrus was arrefted, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent back into his owne Province.

I I.

The preparations of CVRVS, and his first entrie into the Ware.

Guerall Provinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made Warre and Peace, as they thought it meete, not only for the Kings behoofe, but for their owne reputation; viually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet fometimes one with an other: which was the more eatily tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings pleafure, which caused them to frame all their doings, to his will, whatsoeuer it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being fetled in Lydis, began to confider with himfelfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the finall affurance of his brothers lone, held only by his Mothers intercellion; the diffrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedemonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtain the Crowne for himfelfe. Neither was it expedient that he should 20 long lit idle, as waighting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise fomewhat whileft yet his Mother lined, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worfe than only questionable. Hereupon hee first beganne to quarrell with Tiffephernes, and feized vpon many Townes of his jurifdiction, annexing them to his owne Prouince; which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (belides that hee was of condition formewhat timple) being truely paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrells. But Tislaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, and cowardife despised, although he durst not aduenture to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiuing that the Milesians were about to give up them- 20 felues into the hands of that yong Prince, as many other Townes of the tenians had done, thought by terrour to preferue his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne bandes. Wherefore he flew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrue, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no fmall part of his defire. In leaving Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he tookenot only the men of his owne Prouince, or of the Countries adjovning, whose lines were readie at his will; but fecretly he furnished some Gracian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, fome of them warring in Thrace, others in Theffalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them readie to croffe the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had se- 40 cret inftructions to prolong their feuerall warres, that the Souldiers might bee held. in continual exercise, and readic in armes upon the sodaine. Cyrus having sent a power of men to beliege Mietus, forthwith fummoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his affiftance, being thirteene thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artimerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, he could very calily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tiffaphernes out of Affathe leffe: but his purpose was not so to loose time in small matters, that was to bee imploied in the accomplishment of higher designes. Pretending therefore that the Pilidians, a people of Alia the leffe, not fubicet to the Persian, had inuaded his Terri- 50 torie, he raifed the fiege of Miletus, and with all speede marched Eastward, leuing Tillabhernes much amased, who had no leasure to rejoyce that Cyrus had left him to himfelfe, when he confidered that fo great an Armie, and fo firong was never levied against the Rouers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of fine hundred horse, hee posted away to carrie tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

III.

How CYRVS tooke his tourney into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

He tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queene Statina, againft Parylatis, the Queene-Mother, whom finee called the Author and occasioner of the warre. But whileft the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger haltened upon him very fall. For Cyrus made great marches, having his numbers much increased, by the repaire of his Countrimen, though moit fitrengthned by the accessor of seuen hundred of rekes, and of other four hundred of the fame Nation, who resulted who him from the Kine. How terrible marches, having his numbers much increased, by the repaire of his Countrimen. though moit strengthned by the accesse of seven hundred Greekes, and of other sour hundred of the same Nation, who revolted vnto him from the King. How terrible the Greekes were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) hee made in Phrygia; where the Greekes by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the rest of his Armie, which to contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiping that this was but a brauerie) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggagers for faking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a joyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the fame temper. and the more vnlikely to make relistance, because they were prest to the warre against their will and dispositions, whereas his Armie was drawne a-long by meere affection and good will. Neuertheleffe he found it a very hard matter to per fwade the Greekes to passe the River of Emphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with conceit of the tedrous returne. Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to feeke excuses, telling them that Abrocomas one of 20 the Kings principall Captaines, and his owne great enemie, lay by the River against whom he requested them to affish him. By such devices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greekes confidering, That who so passed the River first, should have the most thankes, and might safely returne if the rest should refuse to follow them, they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perfwaded to doe as fome had begunne, and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seeke out Artaxerxes, wheresoever he was to be found. The King in the meane time having raifed an Armie of nine hundred thousand men, was not so confident ypon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomies, who with three hundred thousand men had under-taken to 40 make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a firong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to feeme impregnable, had quitted the paffage, and retired himfelfe toward the Kings forces. not daring to looke Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedamonian fleete, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Armic. I doe not finde that this cowardife of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Campe till five daies were past after the battaile, received either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himselfe, were all made of the same mettall.

Therefore Artacerses was voon the point of retiring to the vttermost bounds of 50 his Kingdome, vntill by Teribasms, one of his Capasines, he was persuaded not to abandon so many goodly Provinces to the Enemie, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharpe disputation of Title to a Kingdome is most availeable) would have growne superior in reputation. By such advice the King resoluted vpon meeting with his brother, who now beganne to be service the superior who have superior who have superior who now beganne to be serviced by the superior who have s cure, being fully perswaded that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King having cast vp a Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foot broade, and eighteene foot deepe, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing fo fafe as to be farre diffant from his enemies.

ò. IIII.

The battaile betweene CYRVS and ARTAXERXES.

He Armie of Cyrus having over-come many difficulties of enill waies. and fearcitie of victualls, was much encouraged by perceining this great feare of Artaxerxes, and being past this trench, marched carelesty in great diforder, having bettowed then Albania Vaunt-currors, Bealts of carriage; when on the fodaine one of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approch. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themselves, and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they faw not till it was after-noone. But when they faw the clowd of dust raised by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their neare approach how well they were marthalled, comming on very orderly, infilence, whereas it had beene expected, that rushing violently with lowd clamours, they should have spent all their force vpon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so vnequall in distent, being all embattailed in one bodie and Iquare, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian manner) in the middest of his owne, did not with the corner and vtmost point thereof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks beginne to distrust their owne manhood, which was not accustomed to make proofe of it selfe, vpon such excessive oddes. It was all most incredible, that so great an Armic should bee so casily 30 chased. Neuerthelesse, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, having learned (contrarie to their custome) to give charge vpon their enemies with filence; had not learned (for it was contrarie to their nature) to receiue a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and lithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twentie) did small hurt that day, because the driuers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his encmiesgaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainely, the Title had been affured 40 vnto him that day, had not he fought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompasse the Greekes, and to set vppon them in the reare, he advanced with fixe hundred Horse, and gave so valiant a charge vpon a squadron of fixe thousand which lay before the King, that hee brake it, flaying the Captaine thereof, Artagerses, with his owne hands and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole companie of fixe hundred, very few excepted, beganne to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King stood in troupe, vncertaine whether to fight, or leave the field, could not containe himselfe, but said; I fee the man, and presently with a small handfull of 50 men about him ranne vpon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the brest. Hauing given this stroke, which was his last, he received immediately the fatall blow, which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded vnder the eye with a dart, throwne by a base-fellow, wherewith astonied, hee fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was unpossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their bett for his fafetie; not caring atterwards for their owne liues, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Malter was flaine. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to bee forthwith firicken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them fled apace, calling vpon the name of Cyrus, and deliring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, and vtterly difmated fuch Persian Captaines, as were now, euen in their owne eies, no better than rebells; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from 10 whence Artaxerxes, making all speede, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There hec met with Tissaphernes, who having made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was readic now to joyne with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, beene sufficient to counteruaile all disasters received; the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would have yeelded little comfort. For Tiffaphernes had not flaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwife, when he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great flaughter through them, in such wife that hee rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the squadron of the 10 Greekes. Hercof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field, gaue chase to all that came in their fight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set upon them in reare. But these good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approch, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being purfued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a brauerie, than with purpose to attempt vpon these bold-fellowes any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom hee would seeme to have slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this 30 reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough, by shewing a manlylooke, halfea mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore hee advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaied on the top of a Speare. This ensigne might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neare them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discouering their approch, fled vpon the spurre; so that none remained in the place of battaile, faue only the Greekes, who had loft that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that hee was pursuing the Armie, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to returne to 40 their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had given them no leifure to Dine.

The bard estate of the Greekes after the fight; and how ARTAXERXES in vaine fought to have made them yeeld vate him

T was now about the fetting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might ferue for foode: so that wanting victualls to fatisfie their hunger, they refreshed their wearie bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the basenesse of his people, and weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainely discouered to the Greekes: which gaue him affurance, that if any of these who had beheld the thamefull demeanor of his Armie, should live to carrie tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signorie. Wherefore hee refolued, to trie all meanes, whereby hee might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carrie tidings of that which hee had feene : to which purpose hee sent them a braue medage the next morning. Charging them to deliuer up their Armes, and come to his Gate, to awaite there vpon his Mercie. It feemes that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death; but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greekes being advertised that morning from Ciriaus, a principall Commander under Cyrus, that his Mafter being flaine, he had retired himfelfe to the place of their latten camping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into lonia, his meaning was to diflodge the next day; awaiting for them fo long if they would joyne with him, but refoluing to flay no longer; they fent anfwere back to drieus, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durit reaft them, they would place Arress himselfe in the Kings Throne, if 4 he would joyne with them, and purfue the victorie. Before they received any reply to this answere, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose errand feemed to the Captaines very infolent : One told them that it was not for the 29 Vanquithers to yeeld their Weapons; another, that hee would die ere hee yeelded to fuch a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as having the victoric, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he defired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie hee meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalinus a Gracian, waiting upon Tiffaphernes, answered; That the King having flaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretendany Title to his Kingdome, in the middest whereof hee held them faft enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted fireigth to kill if they would hold up their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These wordes, to them, who knew themselves to 20 be free, were nothing pleafant. Therefore, one told Phalinus, that having nothing left, but their Armes and Valour, whileft they kept their Armes, their Valour would be feruiceable, but should they yeeld them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalinus laughed, laying; This yongman did sceme a Philosopher, and made a pretie speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes, and his Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalinus being a Courtier. and imploied in a bulinesse of importance, thought himselfe too profound a Statesman, to be checkt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdome herein failed him. For what focuer he him felfe was (of whom no more is knowne than 40 that he brought an vnhonest message to his owne Countrimen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons and Liues, to the mercilesse Bar barians this you Scholler by him despised, was that great Aenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were furprifed by treacherie of the Perfians, being a private Gentleman, and having neuer scene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought fafe into Greese, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Philinus could propound. Some there were who promifed to be faithfull to the King, as they had beene to Cyrus, offering their feruice in Agypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have vse of them. But the finall answere was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends , nordefend 50 themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto hee required their answere. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (faith Phalinus) must I undertand you? as choosing peace if we flay, otherwife warre, faid clear chins. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politique Embaffadour. To whom Clearchia (not willing to acquaint him with their purpofe.) Let our doings tell you; and fo difmiffed him, no wifer than he came. All that day the Greeks were faine to feede vpentheir Horfes, Affes, and other Batts, which they rofted with arrowes, darts, and woodden targets, thrown a way by the Enemies.

How the Greekes beganne to returne home-wards.

T night they tooke their way towards Ariaus, to whom they came at mid-night; being for faken by four chundred foote, and fortic horfe, all Tratiums, who fled ouer to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in peeces: for had they been kindly vfed, it may well be thought that fome of them should have accompanied Tiffaphernes, and ferued as Stales to draw in the rell. Artess being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke upon seeking the Kingand dome for himfelfe, with fuch affittance as might have given it vnto Cyrus, was very well pleafed to make couenant with them for mutuall affifiance vnto the lait: Whereumo both parts having fworne, he adulfed them to take another way home ward, which should bee somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relecue them with victualls, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearifome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purposed themselues to haue encamped: towards which Clearehus made directly, because hee would not seeme by declining them to shew feare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remoue, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath confidered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Gracians being wearie and hungrie, and lying among enemies in an vnknowne Countrie, should be very fearefull: but it is all most past beleefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuoufly, as the present condition inforced them to doe, thould make the Perfians flie out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that in flead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came Meffengers from Artaxernes, defiring free accesse for Emballadours, to entreat of peace. Were it not that fuch particulars doe best open the qualitie of the persons, by whom thinges were managed, I should hold it fitter, to runne oner the generall paffages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances.

40 But furely it is a point very remarkeable, That when Cleurchus had willed the McG fengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greeker as he faid) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full;

Anterixed differabling the indignitie, was contented sweetly to swallow downe this pill, fending them guides who conducted them to a place where was plentic of victualls to releeue them.

ò. V I I.

How TISSAPHERNES under colour of peace betraied all the Captaines of the Greekes.

therto the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought themselves into any straights or termes of disaduantage. But now came vnto them the subtile Fox Tilisphernes, who circumuenting the chiefe Commanders by fine fleights, did mischienously entrapthem, to the extreme danger of the Armie. 15

He told them, that his Prouince, lying neare vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to delire, that their deliuerance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrimen at home, would not be vnthankefull for such a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearse the great seruice that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Grushis intent, and having not only brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs ! that hee, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that flood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth hee) did I alleage to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you fafe into Greece; in which faite 20 I have good hope to speede, if you will fend a mildeanswere to him, who bath willed me to aske you, for what cause yee haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tiffsphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he faid) that peace should be granted : the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victualls by force, in any place that resulted to affoord them an open Market. Hereunto both parties having sworne, the League was concluded, and Tiffaphernes returning to the King to take leaue, and end all bufinesse, came vnto them againe after twentie daies, and then they set forward. This 30 interim of twentie daies, which Tiffaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of miltrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt; the Brethren, and Kindred of Ariens, repairing daily to him, and other Perfians to his Souldiers, did worke him and them fo with affurance of pardon, and other allurements, that hee daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had beene. This caused many to aduise Clewchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to relie upon couenants, and sit still whilest the King laied snares to entrap them. But he on the contrarie perswaded them, to rest contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselves againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting 40 withall their owne wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually giuen and taken, wherewith hee faw no reason why the enemie should haue clogged himfelfe if he meant mischiese, having power enough to doe them harme by a faire and open Warre.

Tisciphernes was a very honourable Man (if honour may bee valued by greatneffeand place in Court) which caused his Oath to bee the more esteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or base respect, was like to have drawne it from him. But his fallhood was fuch, both in fubstance and in fuccesse, as may fitly expound that faying, which proceeded from the fountaine of Truth, I hate a rich man alyar. A lye may finde excuse when it growes out of feare: for that passion hath his ori- 52 ginall from weakenesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almightic, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the falshood is most abhominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his ownestrength against the divine Justice, doth commit that finne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with fure vengeance. It was not long ere Tiliaphernes found meanes to destroy all the Captaines, whom hee subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the reft. The businesse was contriued thus: Hauing trauailed some daies together, in fuch wife, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very jealouse of the great familiaritie, appearing betweene Tissaphernes, and Arious; Cien chus thought it convenient to roote out of Tiffaphernes his braines all causes of distrust, whereof many had growne in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, hee rehearfed the oath of Confederacie, which had patt beto tweene them, showing how religiously he meant to keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receive by the helpe of Tisaphernes, hee promised that their love should appeare to him not vnfruitfull, if he would make vse of their service against the Mysians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Prouince, or against the Azyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he defired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not give place to any close accusation or suspition, whereby might grow fuddaine inconvenience to either of them, vpon no just ground. The faithlesse Perfian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clearchus, that all this was by him in wifely confidered, withing him further to call to minde how many waies hee could haue yied to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by burning the Countrie, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needes have perished by meere famine. For which cause hee said that it had beene great folly, to fecke by perjurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were alreadie in his handes; But the truth was, that his owneloue to them had moved him to worke their fafetie, not only for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their affistance; but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he inuited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and fent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promifed to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tiffaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by fecret information fought to raife diffention between them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceived, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the camp of Tistaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had beene to some common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the fine principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a figne was given, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the relidue flaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Per-40 fram Horse-men scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vo to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping forely wounded, informed them of all that had beene done. Hereupon the Greeker tooke Armes in halt, thinking that the enemie would forthwith haue affailed their Campe. Anon they might perceive the Embassadours of Tisaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arieus, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Armie, faying, That they brought a meffage from the King, which Arieus deliuered to this effect. That Clearchus hauing broken his faith, and the league made, was juftly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the fine Co-50 ronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to furrender their Armes, which were due to him, as having belonged vnto his feruant Crrus. When some altercation had followed vpon this meilige, Xenophon told the Embassadours, that if Clearchus had in such fort offended, it was well that he was in fuch fort punished: but he willed them to fend backe

Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduifed how to answere the Perlian. Hereunto the Embaffadours knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were fent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to preuent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tisaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province walled by the Greekes, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aide of men and money, heedid so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailing him; finally, the King was jealous 10 of his cunning head, and fent a new Lieutennant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the scruice which he could not doe, he was thought vpon priuate ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flie from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. Dut now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, hauing betraied brauer men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiese vpon the whole Armie.

How XENOPHON heartened the Greekes, and in destight of Tissa-PHERNES went off fafely.

Reat was the heavinesse of the Souldiers, being now destitute of Leaders, and no leffe their feare of the cuill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not how to avoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe fadnesse of the whole Armie to be such, as hindred them from taking any course of preuenting the danger at hand, beganne to adulse the under-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had beene, to bethinke them- 30 felues of fome meane, whereby their fafetic might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: fetting before their eyes what socuer might serue to give them hope, and about all perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercie of their barbarous

Hereupon they defired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment ; and fo together with him, the same night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeede in the places of those who were flaine, or taken. This being done, and order fet downe for difburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the loile of Tisaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheape than 40 he had beene wont to fell them; To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceede, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to paffe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tisiphernes, whom they, seruing all on foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farcher distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenophon prouide slings, wherewith he ouer-reached the enemie; and finding some Horses sit for service, that were imploied among the carriages he fet men vpon them; training likewise his Archers, to shoote compasse, who had been accustomed to the point blancke. By these 50 meanes did hee beare off the Persians who affailed him; and sometimes gaue them chace with that band of fiftie Horse, which being well backt, with a sirme bodie of footmen, and feconded with troupes of the light-armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemie to lie a-loofe. Tisaphernes not daring to come to handle-gripes with these resolute men, did possesses the tops of Mountaines, and places of advantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through ail fuch difficulties, he betooke himfelfe to that course, which was indeede the furest, of burning the Countrie. With great forrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victualls cut off. Some aduised to defend the Countrie, as granted by the enemie himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Perfians might be ashamed to doe that which were the desire of such as made puffage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile. was, That being neare vnto the Garduchi, a people enemie to the Persian, they should to enter into their Countrie, palling ouer some high Mountaines which lay betweene them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them if Tissaphernes had begunne sooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

Ntring vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferiour to the Greekes in daring, but on 'y in the Art of warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vied the S'ing well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrie, were of much vse against these poore trauailers, afflicting them in seuen daies, which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betweene the Territoric of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ranne Centrites a great River, upon which the Greekes refreshed themselues one day, rejoycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue easie. But the next morning they faw certaine troupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leaused by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tiffaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broade and deepe, so that it was not possible for fuch as would enter it, to make reliftance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers the Cardnehi following upon them, lay on the fide of a Mountaine, within leffe than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite 40 men, gaue succour to the Reare ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make relistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seeme to have inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tigris; though Ptolomie place them farre more to the East vpon the River of Cyrus in Media, wherein hee differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case descrue credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may indure the feueritie of a Critick. For Piolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: only of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tigris, not much 50 abone Artasigarta springing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardeus in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes having passed Cen-

How TERIBARYS Gouernour of Armenia, feeking to entray the Greekes with termes of fained peace, was disappointed and [hame sitty beaten.

He Armie finding in Armenia good prouision, marched without any diffurbance about liftie or three score miles to the heads of the River Tigris, and patting ouer them, transiled as farre further without refinance, till they were encountred by Teribuzus at the Riuer Telebos, 10 which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though finall; but Pto-lomie and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrie for the Persian, and was in great fauour with Artanernes, whole Court may feeme to have beene a Schoole where the Art of fallbood was taught as wifdome. He defired peace of the Greekes. which was made upon this condition, that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As foone as he had made this league, he leauied an Armie, and befetting the straights of certaine Mountaines which they were to paffe, hoped wel to make fuch benefit of their fecuritie, as might give him the commendations of being no leffe craftily diffionell than Tiffaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of fucceffe. For a great fnow fell, which caused the Greekes 20 to make many fires, and featter themselves abroad in the Villages. Tembazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about feeking reliefe. By the fires he was discouered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was reuealed. Hereupon the Greekes ; taking this captine with them for a guide, fought him out; and comming vpon his Campe, did to affright him, that before the whole Armic could arrive there, the shout which was railed by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Paulion, wherein (belides many flaues, that were Artificers of voluptuoufneile) very rich furniture was left by the treacherons coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Atmie went northward, and passing Euplrates, not far below the springs thereof, trauailed with much 30 difficultie through deepe fnow, being followed aloofe by the enemie, who durft not approch them, but did cut off fuch as they found stragling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrie, through which they marched had their wintering boules vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaile, which likewife did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Hauing refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had confumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond-flaues, and taking away (befides other Horfes and Cattaile) fome Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

XI.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countries bordering topon the River of Phasis, and other ob-Scure Nations.

630 without impediment they came to the River Phasis, neare wherevnto the people called Phasiani Taochi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes were to paile, made countenance of warre: 50 but some companies being sent by night to seize upon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the peece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to flie, every one retyring to the defence of his owne. The first ypon whose Countrie the Greekes did enter were the Tsochi, who convaying all their provision of victualls into ftrong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of cattaile were taken; the people, to avoide captinitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rocks, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then calting themselues upon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattaile, which ferued to feed them, trauailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very front Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prifoners, and cutting of their heads, which they carried away, finging and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions living; who were glad, when after feuen daies journey they efcaped from those continuall skirmilhes, wherewith they had been vexed by these Burbarians. Hence transiling through a good corne-Countrie, inhabited by an obfeure Nation called the Seythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoyning, vsed them friendly, and promifed to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine-Sea. From Gimnius ( which was the name of his Towne) hee led them through the Territoric of his enemics, defiring them to wait it with fword and fire. After fine daies march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Mo-30 school, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, ( with whom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themselues, who borne in that place had beene fold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the land of Colchos, wherein stands the Citie of * Trabifond, called then Trapezus, a Colonic of the . Trabifond a Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hostilitie, were requited with the like; Colonie of the for the Armie, hauing now good leifure to repose themselves among their friends or the bottome the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrie thirtie daies together, for bearing only the of the Engine Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

X I I.

How the Armie beganne at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosequated the same purpose to effect.

Auing now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were defirous to take thipping, and change their tedious Land-journies into an eafie Nauigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedemonian, one of the principall Commanders, promifed by meanes of Anaxibius the Lace Lamonian Admirall, who was his friend, that hee would prouide

Vessells to embarke them. Having thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vse them for their nauigation. Least all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoyning to cleare the waies, and make an case passage for them by Land; whereunto the Souldiers were vtterly vnwilling to giue care, being desirous to returne by Sca: but the Countrie fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and fent to Sea: the one of them failed directly into Greece, for faking their 30 Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabifonde: the other tooke Merchants and Paffengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessells were staied to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals beganne to faile, by reason that all the Land of the colchi, neare vnto the Campe, was alreadic quite walted, they were faine to embarke their fick-men, with thips which they had alreadie prouided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerajus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Herethe Armie being mustered was found to consist of eight thousand and fixe hundred men. From a Mosari a hence they passed through the Countrie of the a Massaci, who were divided into Nation of Post- factions. The stronger partie, despiting their friendship, caused them to joyne with the weaker, whom they left Matters of all.

The next place of their abode was b Cotyora, a Greeke Towne likewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerafus were; but the entertainement which here they found was very churlith, hauing neither an open Market affoorded to 10 them, nor the lick-men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were licke in concenient lodgings; taking into their owne handes the cultodie of the Gates. Prouition for the Armie they made by firong hand, partly out of the Territorie of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were vnwelcome to e Simpe, whence Embassadours were fent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatning to joyne with the P. phlagon ans, if redrefle could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenopion, That meere receifitie had enforced the Armie to teach those of Corrora good manners in fo bad a methode: letting them know, that he feared not to deale 20 with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Smope it lelfe, to which, if cause were given, they would lend affistance. Vpon this answere the Embassiadors grew better aduised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could show, and commanding the Towne of Cotyora to relecue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promifed to affift them with shipping, letting them vnderstand how difficult the passage by Land would proue, in regard of the manie and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenizes, which croffed their way. This good counfaile, and the faire promifes accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armic, which well perceived, that the Citic of Smape would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It 30 was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sca 3 prouided, that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to embarke energy one man of them, then would they not put from the shore.

XIII.

Of diffention which arose in the Armie; and how it was embarked.

Itherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firme vnitie; which now beganne to dissolue 40 and to thaw, by the neighbouring airc of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were fent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope;

Xenophon confidering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitie of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honorable worke to build a Citie in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made facrifice, according to the superstition of histime and Countrie, dinining of his fuccesse by the entrailes of bealts. The Sooth-sayer, whom he imploied, had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Ar 50 taxerxes would not give battaile in ten daies: hee therefore, having preserved his money carefully, was defirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was disulged, which was interpreted according to the diversitie of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraelea, being informed of this confultation, were fore afraide, leaft the pouertie of the Souldiers, who had not whe rewith to maintaine themselines at home, should give successe to the project. Which to preuent, they promifed to fupply the Armie with a fufficient fleet, and likewife offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon under-tooke to give the Souldiers pay, if they would prefently let faile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a bandhed man, defired them to follow him into Treat; an other offered to leade them into Cherronefus. Xenophon who defired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that hee would have them to let forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that flourd for fake the Armie, before fuch time as they were arrived at their journies end. Estimus the Sooth-fayer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby flaied from our running his fellowes, and driven to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were maca croubled and afraid, when they perceived, that thips were prepared fufficient for their Nauigation, but that the money promised to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraelea, knowing that the Armic was now resoluted for the voiage, and that xenophon, whom they feared, had perswaded them to this resolution; thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Nauie 20 whileft they were in good readineffe to depart, but to keepe the money to themselues. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with faire hopes, repented much of their hastie offers, and fignifying as much to Xenophon, praied him to make proposition to the Armic, of taking the ships, and failing to Phasis, where they might feize vpon Lands, and plant themselves in such wise as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to worke the principall of their owne followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becomining publike, bred a suspition of xenophon, as if he had wonne the rest of the Captaines to his purpose, and meant now to catrie the Armie quite an other 30 way from their owne home. Wherefore affembling the Companies, he gaue them fatisfaction, and withall complained of some disorders, which he caused them to redreffe. A generall inquilition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassiadours from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents desired peace of the Greekes: the Embaffadours were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have beene fought, for that the Greekes having now their Fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchors, and set saile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whether Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admirall Anaxibius, who promifed to give the Armic pay as foone as they came 40 into the parts of Greece.

Another great diffention and distraction of the Armie. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and refened by XENOPHON.

He nearer that they approched to Greece, the greater was their defire to make prouision for themselves, that they might not returne home emptie-handed. Wherefore trusting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, hee might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determi-Lilla ned to make Aenophon fole Commander of all; in whose fauour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to diffilease the Lace Jemonians who were jealous of him alreadic (being incensed by that fugitiue who forfooke the Armie at Trabizond, flying with one of their two fhips) or moued by some tokens appearing to him in the entrailes, that threatned ill fucceife to his government, procured with vehement contention that this honour was laied upon Cherisophus a Lacedamonian. It see hes that Xenophon, considering the vexations incident to the conduct of a voluntarie Armic, wanting pay, did wifely in yeelding to fuch tokens as forbad him to accept it: especially, knowing so well their defire, which was, by right or by wrong to get wealth wherefoeuer it might bee 10 found, without all regard of Friend or of Foe. Cherifophus had beene Generall but fixe or feuen dates, when hee was deposed, for hauma beene vn willing to robbe the Towne of Heracles, which had fent prefents to the Campe, and beene very beneficiall vnto them in lending thips for their transportation. Two daies they had failed by the coalt of Aia, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heracles, where confulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one feditious man began to put them in minde of feeking to get fomewhat for them felues; telling them that all their prouition would bee spent in three daies, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrie, victuals, and other necessaries, could not bee had without 10 money; for which cause he gaue aduice to fend messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to viderstand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand precess of money, called Cyzinens, which summe amounteth to two thousand and flue hundred pound starling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the fumme raifed to ten thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Cheriforhus, as being Generall, the fitteft man; others had more delire to fend Xenos hon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Least therefore either of these should faile in managing the bufineffe which agreed not with his dispolition, others of more impudencie and leffe diferetion were fent, who in fuch wife deliuered their infolent mef- 20 fage; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to bee disappointed of their rauenous purpose, they fell to mutinic, saying, That their Leaders had betraied them: and being for the more part of them Areadians, and Achaens, they for fooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. About foure thousand and fine hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captaines, failed vnto the Port of Calpas, which is in the mid-way betweene Heraeles and Bizantium, with purpose to affaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred of whom one 40 thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which small band had done good feruice alreadie, and could not have beene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Gouernour of Bizantium, to meete him at the mouth of the River Calpas, whither Cleander promifed to bring some Gallies to conveigh him ouer into Greece; for which cause hec tooke his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon fuch shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed vpon the Confines of Heracles, and Thracia Afiatics, intending to make a cut through the mid-land-Countrie to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calpus by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Compa- 50 nics, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, fine or fixe miles from the Sea; in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and fo was that part of the countrie surprised on the suddaine, and sacked all at one time.

The place of Rendeuous was an high peece of ground, where some of them arrived, finding no diffurbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaping, the reit were all put to the fword. For the Thracians which escaped at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raife the Countrie, and finding the Greekes loden with bootie, tooke the advantage of their diforder, cutting in pecces those two Regiments: which done they attempted the reft, encompating the hill whereon they encamped. One great aduantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleafure make retrait from these Arcadians, and Acheans: who wanting the affiltance of horse, and having to neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to fland meerely youn their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many wounds received, the Larts and Arrowes of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to craue parlie. What locuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for affurance they would give none, without which the Greekes well knew, that all promifes of fuch people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophen holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Trausilers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Armie, passing along those parts : and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly throwne on themselves, hee marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gave him the intelligence. His horse-men be sent before to discouer, and to scoure the waies; the light armed foot nien tooke the hill-tops on either hand; all of them fetting fire on whatfocuer they found combuttible, whereby the whole Countrie feemed to bee on a light-flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that fome huge Armie had approched. That night he encamped on a Hill, within five mile of the Areadi ns, encreasing will the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to bee quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainely that hee would have come vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all balt to dislodge. Early the next morning 30 Nenophon comming thither in very good array, to have given battaile, found that his device, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but hee marusiled that the Greekes were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquirie, that they removed at breake of day, and perceived by fignes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calpas, in which journey hee ouer tooke them. They embraced Him, and His, with great joy: Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that hee should have come by night, wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid least he had forsaken them, and thereforehaftened away, to ouertake him, and joyne with him. So they arrived at the Hauen of Calpus, where it was decreed, That who focuer from thencefort a made a-40 ny motion to dilioyne the Armie, should suffer death.

Of diners peeces of service done by XENOPHON; and how the Armie retura ned into Greece. The occasions of the Warre betweene the Lacedamonians and the Perfian.

He Hauen of Calpas lay under a goodly head-land, that was very ftrong, and bounding with all kinde of Graine and Fruits, except Oliues. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very contenient feate for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might have allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to hast away, fearing least Xenophon should finde some deuice to have fetied himselfe and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to live at home, neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare vnto him: the poorer fort were luch as left their Parents, Wines, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now delirous to returne. But whether it were so that Aenophon found advantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the fignes appearing in the entrailes, did indeede forbid their departure: follong they were intorced to abide in the place till victualls failed, neither would to the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Countrie, vntill the Sacrifices should promife good fuccesse. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the fooner felt want. For which caule, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Chersfophus, would needes aduenture to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood neare at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Countrie lying in wait to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the affiliance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troupes falling upon the Greekes that were scat- 29 tered abroade in feeking bootie, flew fine hundred of them, and chafed the reft to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this overthrow comming to Aenophon, he led forth a part of the Armie to the refeue of those that survived, and brought them fafe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythmians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, flew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemie, together with the present condition of the Armie, so disheartened and vnfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remove their Campe to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of fuch as were least able to indure trauaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately staine, and to 30 abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Affiliants. In this journey his demeanour was very Honourable. For having given buriall to the dead, the Enemic was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leaue at their backs a wood scarce passeable) he marched directly, telling his men plainely, that hee had rather follow the enemic with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Balanian, hee would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victualls to sustaine 40 them in the place, and thips to carrie them away? wherefore hee willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than an other day falling; and not to regard the vneasse returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish vnto the Encmie a faire and casie way, by which hee might flie from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persans and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrie forthwith, remouing their Families, and leauing all that could not fodainely bee conneighed away, to the diferetion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the haruest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the fide of Afia. For they were not only fuffered quietly 50 to enjoy the spoile of the Countrie, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonic on the Port of Calpas, Embassadours were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best affillance. But the Souldiers had no minde to flay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great bootie, which they carried away to Chry poolis, a Citie neare vnto Chalce lon, where they fold it. Pharnabanaus, Licutenant in Phrygia to Areaxernes, did greatly feare, least their long flay in that Countrie might breede in them a defire to vilite his Pronince, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore hee fent to the Lacedemonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promiles to wast them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to give the Souldiers pay, as soone as they arrived at Bizan-10 tium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreatie of the Persian, who in the heigth of his pride had thought them so furely imprisoned with mightie Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to furrender their Armes into his handes, and so to yeeld their lives to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they seized upon Bizantium, which by Aenophons persistent they forbare tofack, I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertaine little to the generall course of thinges. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discouer the secrets of Asia, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpongreater enterprifes, than euer their forefathers had undertaken. Likewise it 20 was the only remarkable action which the time affoorded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italie; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedemonians ruling infolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lacedemonians made upon Artaxerxes, were alreadie fowne, before these companies returned out of the high Countries of Afia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had sided with yong Cyrus against Tiffaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell, which they thought fafer, than to fall into the handes of Tiffaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians befought the Lacedemonians to fend them aide, whereby to recouer their libertie; and obtained their request.

For a power was sentouer, under conduct of Thimbro

a Spar: m, who bestowed his men in such Townes as had alreadie revolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensine Warre.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilest they were menaged by the Lacedæmonians.

How the Lacedamonians tooke courage by example of XENOPHONS Armie, to make Warre upon ARTAXERXES.

I feemes that the Lacedamonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour thewed unto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient 20 to take all care that no advantage might flip, which could ferue to firengthen their estate, by finding the Perlian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Armie had reucaled the basenesse of those esseminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, vpon termes of extreme difaduantage; then was all Greece filled with defire of undertaking upon this huge unweldie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Su/a, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able 30 to give them reliftance, in all that long journey of foure and thirtie thousand two hundred and fiftie fine furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of Englilh miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painefull march of one yeare and three moneths. Neuertheleffe the civill diftraction wherewith Greece was miscrably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew back out of Alia the power of the Lacedamonians, to the defence of their owne effate; leauing it questionable whether Agesilaus, having both the same, and farre greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeares, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commenda- 40 tion of magnanimitie and faire behauiour, than of flout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly so euer it pleased xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying neare the Sea, carrie no proportion to Xenophons owne journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled : the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with fix thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrie, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodofius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agefilaus and his warres in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place.

ò. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the warre in Asia.

HIMBRO receiving Xenophons men, beganne to take in Townes, and to entertaine all fuch as were willing to reuolt from the Perfun, who were many, and some of them such, as had been highly benolding to the King; who seeme to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to line under the government of Tiffsphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Mafter did love him. "The managing of the warre begunne by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his handes, and committed to Dercyllidus a Spartan, who behaued himfelie as a good man of warre, and a wife Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Ajia was divided betweene Pharnahazas and Tiffaphernes, who didill agree, Phanabazas being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes fauour the greater, and having the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Derevicus who did beare a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tiffaphie was avas of a mischieuous nature, and would not be sorrie to see his Corriuall throughly beaten, though to the Kings loffe) made an appointment with Tiffaphernes, and forth-20 withentred Lolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnibasing which Prouince, in few daies, he brought into his owne power.

That Countrie of Lolis had about the same time suffered a violentalteration. which gaue carle fuccesse to the attempts of Dercylledus. Zenis a Dardanian had been Deputie to Phernabasus in those parts; after whose death his wife Chania procured his Office, wherein thee behaued herfelfe fo well, that thee not only was beloued of the people under her gouernement: but enlarged her Territoric, by the conquest ofcertaine Townes adjoyning; and fundrie times gaue affiftance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Mystans and Pisidians. For shee had in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vsage did her great service. But somewhat be-30 fore the arrivall of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Atidias, whom shee trusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to stifle her, and kill her sonne of seuenteene yeares old; which done, he seized vppon two of her principall. Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabacia, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not only rejested by Pharnabagus, but revenge of his fowle treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driven into tearmes of almost otter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias, 40 did quickly open their Gates. One only Towne stood out foure daies (against the will of the Citizens, who were couctous of libertie) the Gouernour striuing in vaine to haue kept it to the vie of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities Gergethe and Sceplis, which the Traitour held, who fearing all men, as being loued of none, sent Embassadours to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speake with him, and pledges for his fecuritie : vpon the deliucrie of which hee iffued out of sceptis, and comming into the Campe, made offer to joyne with the Greekes vpon firth conditions, as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainely sold by Dereyllaten, that other condition there was none, than to fet the Citizens freely ablibertie. And prefently vpon these wordes they marched toward Scepsis. When which pensioned that it 50 was in vaine to ftring against the Armic, and the Townessinen; who were all of one minde; he quietly went along with Dercyllidan; who remaining but a few houres in the Citie did a facrifice to Minerus, and then leading away the Garrison of Aticine, he left the Citie free, and departed toward Gergethe. Add not for lake his Companie, but followed him, earnefly intreating that hee might bee suffered to re-

taine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercylledas) I must here likewise doe a facrifice to Minerua. The Traitor, not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercinaries to open the Gates, whereby Dererllides, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serve under his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were feized upon, as belonging to one that had beene subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemie to the Greekes and fo the murderous wretch was fent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World hee might finde any place to hide his detefted head. Dercyllidas, having in eight daies taken nine Cities, purpofed for the ease of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end hee tooke 10 Truce with Pharnabazue, who had not any defire of Warre. That Winter, and the Sommer enfuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, belides the walting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Maine, was fortified, being foure or fine miles in breadth, by which meanes eleuen Townes with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thracians. and made fit and able to victuall the Campe. Likewise the Citic of diarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with prouision. After this, Dercylidas had command from Sparta, to divert the warreinto Caria, where was the feate of Tillaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vneatie to recouer all the Townes of Jonia: Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearely Office) 20 being appointed to joyne with him. Though it was manifest that Tiffaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessitie, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazaus having respect to the Kings scruice, came to asfift his private enemie Tiffaphernes, and so passing into Caria, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for relistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne dores, to was Dere, Illulas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Caria. For which cause he passed the River of Meander, and not looking to have been so some encountered, marched carelefly through the Countrie: when on the very fodaine 20 the whole Armie of Tillaphernes and Phannabazus was discouered, confisting of Perfians, Carians, and some Mercinarie Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battaile. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in advantage of ground; for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the tonians, together with the Handers and others, of fuch places as bordered vpon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselues to present flight; or abiding a while for thame did plainely discouer by their lookes, that they meant not to be more bold than wife. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honor, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs have brought 40 them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnahamus had beene followed, who perceiuing the opportunitie of fo great a victorie, was not willing to let it flip. But Tillaphernes, who naturally was a coward, feeing that countenance of relistance was made, beganne to confider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wifest way to craue parlie; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, to last vntill Tistaphernes might receive answere from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part that all the Greekes in Asia might enjoy their ownelibertic and lawes, but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedamonians should depart Asia, and leave the Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; only it served to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who defired to avoide the warre by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by triall of a battaile.

How the Lacedamonians tooke reuenge upon the Eleans for old diffleafure. The difcontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceused against the State of Sparta.

N the meane feafon the Lacelemonians, who found none able to withhand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to accompt for some difgraces received by their during the late warres, when leisure was wanting to the requitall of such pettie injuries. These Eleans being & Presidents of the Almoniana cames, had for a fine woon the Cirica's

Prefidents of the Olympiaque games, had fet a fine vpon the Citie of Star ..., 101 Non-paiment of which, they forbade them to come to the folemnitie: and publiquely whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for prefuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing facrifice to Inpiter; and in all points yied great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no bulineffe that could hinder them from taking reuenge: and therefore sent a peremptoric message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at libertic the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the viuall pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of fuch 20 Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vallals of the Lacedamonians. In their late warres with Athens, the strong opposition which they found caused this goodly Title of libertie to worke very flowly: but having now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present successe to their desires. Two yeares together they sent an Armie into the Countrie of the Eleans : the first yeare an earthquake (held in those times a prodigious signe, and which did alwaies forbid the prosecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeare, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the Citie it selfe was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their libertie, and to have her owne walls throwne 30 downe. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted, that they would in time comming vie modefuly, finding themselves to stand at the mercie of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were assistant to the Lacedamoniums, excepting the Corinthians and Bacotians, whose aide hauing beene of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian Warre, as the force of Sparta it felfe, they could not fmoother their diflike of their vnequall division following the victorie; which gauc to Spartathe command of all Greeces to Thebes, and Corinth, only securitie against Athens, but such a securitie as was worse than the danger For when the equall greatnesse of two mightic Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weales to adhere to 40 either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to reuenge injuries. they had by mortall hatred profecuted the warre to extremitic, leaving the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both, it was then (if not necessarie to obay the greatnesse which themselves had made yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuerthelesse, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victoric or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

The passing of Agestlans into Asia. His warre with Tissapher nes.
How Tissapher nes was put to death, and the warre discreted into an other Prounce, through persuasion and gifts of Tithranstes his fuccessor. How caveleste the Persian Licutenants were of the Kings good.

Gestlass newly made King of Sparta, was defirous to have the honour of the victorie, which, not without earlie, he expected upon those of A/sa, and therefore procuring a great Armie to joyne with that of Leers/llulis, he tooke his way in great pompe to Aids in Baotta, a Hauen, lying opposite to the lland of Eubea, in which place Agamenton

(leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Troy, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon hee meant also to doe facrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrie, would not permit, but faving that the performance of fuch ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers, they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then conuenient time for Age/laus to entangle himselfe and his Countrie in any new warre; there- 20 fore, waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intendment. Having landed his men at Ephelus, he was entertained by Tiffaphernes with a Treatic of peace, wherein Agefilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian thould restore to libertic all the Greeke Townes in Alia, was promifed that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answere to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tiffaphernes had fought only to winne time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilest Agestlaus was bulie in fetling the Estates of his Confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming downe of these for- 30 ces which Artaxerxes had fent:at what time Ageflaus received a plaine message from Tiffaphernes, that either hee must forth-with depart out of Alia, or make good his aboade by itrong hand. Agefilans returning word that he was glad to heare that his enemies had by perjurie deferued vengeance from Heauen, prepared to inuade them; and fending word to all the Townes which lay betweene him, and Caria, that they should prouide victualls, and other necessaries for his Armie, did casily make Tiffaphernes beleeue, that his intent was to inuade that Prouince wherein Tif-Saphernes dwelt, and which was vnfit for Horle, in which part of his forces the Perfian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plaines of Maander, hoping thereby to 40 stoppe the passage of a heavie foot-Armie, not suffering them to passe into that Countrie which was fittest for their service. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Pbrygia, where they tooke great spoile without relistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmilh having the better of the Greekes, were the occasion that Azefilaus returned to Ephelus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiuing by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the mafterie of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which meanes having enabled himfelfe, whilest winter lasted, hee entred vpon the Countrie of Tiffaphernes, as soone as the season of 50 the yeare would permit, and not only tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Meander, without affishance of their infanterie, heegauethem battaile, and had a great victorie, taking their Campe in which hee found great riches. The blame of this loffe fell heanie vpon Tiffaphernes

Tiffaphernes, who either upon cowardife had abfented himfelfe from the battaile; orfollowing some other businesse, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master hauing him in diffruit, and thinking that peace might be the fooner had, which hee much delired, if the man, fo odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way, he fent into those parts Tithraufles a Persian, to cut off the head of _ Illiaphernes, and succeede him in the gouernement. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by perjurichce could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wifedome, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought him-10 felle most perfect. For supposing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation hee should one way or other circumuent the Greekes, and make them wearie of Mas he did not leeke to hnilh the warre, and, according to his Masters wish, bring all things facedily to quiet, but rather to temporife till he might finde some opportunitie of making such end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his owne. Wherein it feemes that he much miftooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would hee much more gladly haue taken it, if he could haue found fuch meanes whereby the danger it felfe might have beene avoided: as not louing to have warre whileft by anyconditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well 20 by the course which Tithraustes tooke at his first possession of the low-Countries. Forhe sent Embassadours to Agesslaus, in very friendly fort, letting him know, that theman who had beene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie beforthwith difmiffed. The answere to this proposition, was by aggillaus referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the meane feafon he was content to transferre the warreinto the Prouince of Pharnahazaus, at the request of Tithrausles, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensive and on the defen-30 flue part. For Age/lla. s having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbeare his feuerall Provinces, at the entreatic of the Lieutenants; and those Lieutenants being emploied by the King to maintaine his Estates against all enemies ( wherein if they failed they knew that their heads might cally bee taken from their (houlders) were little offended at any loffe that fell on their next Neighbour-Proninces, which were subject likewise to the same Crowne of Perlia, so long as their owne government could be preserved free from wast and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side I can ascribe to nothing so deseruedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and Ministers of pleafure, were able by partiall construction to countenance, or dif-40 grace, the actions of fuch as had the managing of things abroade; and to that foolith manner of the Kings (which was so vsuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Prounciall Gouernour, according to the beneat or loffe, which the Countrie given in charge vnto each of them received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as every one was desirous to make his owne Territorio yeeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to assist his borderers, if loste or danger might thereby grow to himfelfe and his; but fate still third from farre greater miseries.

The Warre and Treatie betweene AGESILAVS and PHARNABAZVS.

GESILAVS having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and walting the Countrie without reliftance. Hec tooke the Palace of Pharmabazius, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behauiour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not winne Cities and Places of ffrength, which might have encreafed his power, and given affurance to the reft of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him fome that were discontented and stood upon bad termes with the great King, whom heeloft agains as callly, by meanes of some slightingurie done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharmabagus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for searc of being belieged, but kept the field, lying as neare as he could fafely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which hee found not vncalle to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessitie, had beene so great, that when hee (obtaining parlie) 20 did set before their cies his bountie towards them, and his loue (which had beene fuch, that belides many other hazards of his person, hee had for the rescue of their fleet, when it was driven to runne a thore at Abydus, adventured to ride into the Sea as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-back against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer beene violated in word ordeede: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise then by telling him, That having warre with his Master, they were inforced, against their will, to offend him. Igefilaus did make a faire offer to him, that if hee would revolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrie wherein hee was at that time only Deputie to Artaxernes. But 10 Pharnabazus told him plainely, That if the King his Mafter did put him in truft to make warre against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemie; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and hee commanded to obay an other, hee would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest emploiment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agest. aus, and the with-drawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appeale Pharnabazus, whom he had not inuaded for want of more necessarie businesse elsewhere; but because his Countrie would yeeld great bootie; and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedemonians changed an honourable 40 Friend into a hot Enemie, who afterwards requited their unthankefulneffe with

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Perlian.

MINIST.

N the meane while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agestlaus meant nothing leffe than to returne into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly 50 in Asia, tooke a wife course whereby the Citie of Sparta was not only driuen to looke to her owne, and give over her great hopes of subuerting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and faw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her owne Territorie. He fent into Greece fittie talents of filuer, to bee implosed in railing warre against the Lucedemonians; which treasure was, by the subtile practise of him that was put in truit with it, in fuch wife dispersed, among the principall men of the Thebans, Argues, and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly borne fecret hate to that of Sparta, were now delirons of nothing fo much as of open war. And least this great heate of the incenfed multitude should, for want of prefent exercife, beginne to faint, and vanish away in idle wordes, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedamonians into Armes, that they themselues might seeme Authours of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adjudged vnto them, and received yearly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phoesans not meaning so to loose their Rent, made a diffresse by strong hand, recovering a great deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tennants) requited with an inualion made vpon Phocis, waiting that Countrie in the manner of open warre. Such were the beginnings of professed hostilitie betweene Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close enmitie, that had long time, though hardly, been concealed. For when the Phocian Embaffadours came to Sparta, complaining of the o violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very tauourable audience, and readie confent to their fuite; it being the manner of the Lace Lamonians, to deferre the acknowledgment of injuries received, vntill occasion of revenge were offered, and then to discouer their indignation in cold bloud. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wills, having no other war to diffurbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they fent Ly (ander to raife all the Countries about Phocis, and with fuch forces as he could leavie, to attend the comming of Paulanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath beene shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great 20 reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to reuolt from Thebes. Panjanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who refused to affist him in that enterprise) meaning to joyne with Lyfander, and make a speedie end of the war. The confideration of fo great a danger, approching fo fwiftly, caused the Thebans to feeke what helpe they could abroade, for a fmuch as their owne strength was farre too little to make relistance against such mightie preparations. It was not vnknowne to them, that many followers of the Laced emonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst vtter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were litle availeable, confidering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could: by which manner of terginer sation, the 40 Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the fafeil course to procure the affiltance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, & make their partie strong. To this end they fent Embassadours to Athens, exculing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompenced with friendship lately shewen in their refusall of affishing Paulanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honours fake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to 50 her former Estate and Dignitie. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had beene well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courtesic which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aide the Lacedemonians in this Warre; but that it should affift the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Paufanias lay Mmmm 2

ftill, waiting the arruall of his Confederates; Lyfander being defirous to doe fomewhat that might advance the builnesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Paulania did not meete him, as had been appointed yet he attempted the Towne, and was flaine in fight by the Thebans, who came halfily to the refcue. As this victoric did encourage the Thebans, so the comming of Paulanias with his great Armie did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were foone reujued by the ftrong fuccour which was brought from Athens, in confideration of which, and of the late battaile, Paufanias durit not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition, departed out of their Territorie, for which, either cowardife or indifcretion, he was at his re- to turne to Sparta condemned as a Traitour, and driven to flie into Tegea, where hee ended his daies in banifhment.

How AGESILAVS was called out of Afrato helpe his Countrie. A victorie of the Spartans. CONON the Athenian, afsifted by PHARNABAZVS, ouercomes the Lacedamonian fleet; recouers the mastrie of the Seas; and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

His good fuccesse, and the confederacie made with Athens, gaue such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argines, Corinthians, Eubwans, Locruss, and Acarnanes, did forthwith lide with unsus, unsurance of Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as Armie, determined to giue battaile to the Lacedamonians, as neare as neare as the Lacedamonians, as neare as the Lacedamonians, as neare as the Lacedamonians they might, to their owne dores; Confidering that the force of spartait felfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiuing the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obaied them, and promiting his friends in Afia to returne speedily to their affiftance, paffed the ftraights of Hellefont into Europ. In the meane time the Citics of the new league had given battaile to the Lacedamonians, and the remainder of their Affociates, but with ill fuccesse. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the A gines and Thebans returning from the chafe in some dilorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedamonians, who meeting them in good order, wonne from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedemonians, and made the victorie of that day entirely their owne. The report of this battaile meeting Agefilaus at Amphipolis, were by him fent ouer into a/a, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had fince his departure feene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lifander the Admirall flaine. The fame man, whose endeauour had brought the Athenians into order, by advancing the Sea-forces of the Laced emonians with money, and all manner of 40 supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sea, when the Citie was despoiled of her old reputation, and scarsly able to maintaine an Armie by Land for berowne defence. Pharnabazus confidering how much it imported the King his Master, to have the Greekes divided into such factions, as might vtterly disable them from undertaking abroade, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not neede any more, to seeke peace by entreatie and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vn-prouoked had fold his love for thirtie Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Atherian with eight thips, who had escaped, when the fleet of Athens was surprised by Lylander at Agos-Potames; giving him the command of a great Navie, 50 wherewith he requited the losse received at Agos. Potamos, by repaying the Lacedemonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victorie Conon failed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberalitie of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victoric, so strong a Nauie, and so much gold, as encouraged the

Of sundrie small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedamonians loofe all in Asia; The Athenians recouer some part of their old Dominion.

Enerthelesse the Lacedamonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeares the honour of their estate, endangered very greatly by this loffe at Sea. For Agefilans obtained the better with his horse-men, from the Thessalans, who were accounted the best ridges in Greece: He wasted Ba osia, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whom hee overthrew; and by his Marshall Gylis forraged the Countrie of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gaine of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battailes of Coronea vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount 20 Helicon, opening way perforce when Agefilaus charged them in their returns from the pursuit. Likewise Gilis was slaine with a great part of his Armie by the Locrians; and some other exploits by the Laced emonians performed against the Corinthians, were repaied with equall damage received in the parts adjoyning; many Townes being casily taken, and as easily recoursed. The varietie of which enter-feats was fuch, that the Thebans themselves were drawne, by the losse of the Hauen of Corinth, to fue for peace, but could not get audience, till fuch time as the newes came of a great victoric obtained by Iphierates, Generall of the Athenian-forces at Lecheum: whereupon the Theban Embassadours being sent for, and willed to doe their mesfage, required only in scorne, to have a safe conduct given them, that they might 30 enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incursions, wherein the Achaems, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrarie side, vntill Agefilaus repaied these inuaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought your their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanes that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, upon which the succeffe of all depended. For when the Townes of Asia perceived, that the Lacedamemissis were not only intangled in an hard warre at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, having loft their fleet at Chidus; they foone gave eare to Pharmabazus, who promifed to allow that they should vie their owne lawes, if they would expell 40 the Spartan Gouernours. Only the Citic of Abidus did stand firme, wherein Dercyllidus lay, who did his best to containe all the Townes about Hellespont, in the alliance of the Lacedemonians; which he could not doe, because the Athenian fleet vnder Thrasphulus tooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered unto the Persian by the Lacedemonians. Of fundric fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of ANTALCIDAS.

Bout this time the Spartans beganne to perceive, how vneasie a thing it would bee, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselves, affilted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxernes, most basely offering, not only to renounce the Greekes inhabiting A/ia, and to leave them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Ilanders, and every Towne in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute libertie, whereby they faid that all the principall Estates of their Countrie would so be weakened, that no one, nor all of them should becable to stirre against the great King. And fure it was, that the power of the Countrie being fo broken, and rent into many small peeces, could neither have disquieted the Persian, by an offensive warre, nor have made any good defence against him, but would have left it eatie for him in continuance of time, to have taken the Cities one after an other, till hee had made himselfe Matter of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with enuie, that perceiuing how the Dominion of the Seas was like to returne to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all a-like weake; than to permit that any of their owne Nation should grow stronger than themselues, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalfe joyned together against the Lacedamonians, did by their severall Embaffadours oppose themselves vnto it, and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes, rather to weaken the Lacedemonians yet more, than by interpoling him felfe to bring friends and foes on the fuddaine to an equalitie. Especially Strutkas, whom Artaxerxes did fend as his Lieutenant into the low-Countries, did feeke to repay the harmedone by Agefilaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plaine, and 20 all hope of the peace being thereby cut off; Thimbro was fent into Afia to make war vpon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the warre, being scattered about, all the Iles and Townes on the firme Land grew almost to the manner of piracie and robberie, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthie of remembrance. Thimbro was flaine by Struthas, and in his place Diphridas was fent, who demeaned himselfe more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, because hee had not impeached Thrasybulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised and slaine in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasybulus, departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was flaine by the way at Aspendus. The Citie of Rhodes had long before joyned 30 with the Lacedemonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Ariflocratie, or the Gouernement of a few the principall Citizens, where as contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soueraignetic into the handes of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselues, by erecting in the Townes of their Confederates a Gouernment like vnto their owne: which doing (where more especial cause did not hinder) caused the Nobilitie to fauour Sparta, and the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Agina roued vponthe coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Armie in Agina, and befrege their Towne : but this frege being raised by the affistance of the Lacedemonian fleet, the Ilanders beganne a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships againe, that returned 40 beaten, having lost foure of thirteene. The losse of these ships was soone recompensed by a victoric which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Agina, whereuppon the Ilanders were faine to keepe home, and leaue to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well feeme strange that the Citie of Athens, having but newly raised her walls; having not by any fortunate and important battaile fecured her estate from dangers by land; but only depending vpon the affiftance of fuch Confederates, as carried vnto different ends, had often discouered themselues irresolute in the common cause; would fend a fleet and an Armie to Cyprus, in defence of Eurgoras, when the mastric of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Iland lying in the cic of Pir.cens, had abilitie to vexe the coast of Attica. But as the ouer-weening of that Citie did canse 50 it viually to embrace more than it could compaffe; so the infolencie and shamelesse injustice of the people, had now bred in the chiefe Commanders, a desire to keepe themselues farre out of sight, and to seeke emploiments at such distance as might secure them from the eies of the enuious, and from publike judgements, out of which

CHAP.II. S.9. of the Historie of the World. few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the life of Leskos; Iphierates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carrie away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrie well could have spared, with which hee returned not when the bulineffe in Cyprus came to an end, but fought new aduentures in Egypt, whereby arose neither thankes to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careleffe of things at hand, had a notable blow given vnto them, shortly after that Chabrius was gone to Cypria, euen within their owne Hauen. For Teleutias, a Lacedemonian, being made Gouernour of Agma, conceined a firong hope of furprifing the Nauie of Athens, 10 as it lay in Piraus; thinking a-right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten thips prepared for the fight, than with twentie lying in harbour, whose Marriners were a fleepe in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tauernes. Wherefore hee failed by night vnto the mouth of the Port, which entring at the breake of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on thore, & few or none left abourd to make relitance: by which meanes hee tooke many thips laden with marchandizes, many fisher-men, paffengers, and other Vessells, also three or foure Gallies. hauing funke or broken, and made vnferuiceable, as many of the rest as the time would fuffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in marriage, with whom hee lived about the 20 Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedemonians were placed in the lower Ain; by whole affiltance, the fleet of Spartagrew victorious about itelle pont; in such wife, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themfelies procured by Antalei las, from the great King, the conditions whereof were fuch as are mentioned before, giving freedome to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Countrie into as many feuerall States as there were pettic Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxernes having bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become arbitrator and decider of Controuerlies between the Greekes, dispofing of their businesse in such wife as stood best with his owne good. The tenor of Artaxerves his decree was, That all Asta and Cyprus should be his owne; the Iles of 30 Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus be subject to Athens; all other Greeke Townes, as well the little as the great, bee let at libertie; and that who socuer should refuse this peace, vpon them the approuers of it should make warre, the King affiling them by Land and Sea, with men, and thips, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their loffes at Sea; the Lacedemonians by renolt of their Confederates, and the neceffitie of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miferies of the warre, whereof they faw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Laced amonisms taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Argines to depart out of Corinth ( which under pretence of defending 40 they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leaue Bxotia free, of which Prouince Thebeshad alwaies held the government: the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of Buotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw downe their owne Citie, and to dwell in Villages: alleaging that they had formerly been accustomed so to doe, though purpoling indeede to chastise them, as having beene ill affected to Sparta in the late war. By these courses the Lacedamonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as

would be vnable to make opposition.

turned from worke, and so passed vndiscouered vnto the house of Charan, whom

Phyllic at the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemne featt being then held in the Citic, Phyllidas promifed the Gouernours, who were in-

ð. X. The warre-which the Lace emonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynshus by famine.

Hilest these warres, which ended without either victorie or profit, confumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne to mightie, that shee did not only command her Neighbour-Townes, but was become terrible to places farre remoued, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with 10

Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the viual pretence of the Lacedemonians, to fet at libertie the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Domi-Fions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being nearest vnto the danger of these incrocking neighbours, acquainted the Lacedemonians with their feare, affirming that this Lominion of the Olynthians would bee too throng for all Greece, if some continuance of time should give it reputation, which only it wanted, wherefore they requested affishance, but in such termes as did sound of compulsion, protesting that either they must warre upon Olynthus, or become subject vitto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hastic leavie of 10 men, two thousand being presently sent away with promise to bee seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the bodie of the Armie following them surprised the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betraied into the handes of Phabidas the Lacedemonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the flauerie of their Countrie. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made betweene them; which caused the Lacedemonians to doubt whether this act of Phabidas were more worthis of reward or of punilhment; In conclusion, profit so farre ouer-weighed honestie, that the deede was approued, many principall Citizens of Thehes condemned to death, ma- 30 niedriuen into banifhment, and the Traitors rewarded with the government of the Cirie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to ferue the Lacedemonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This accesse of power having strengthned the Lacedamonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it felfe to their obedience.

d. X I.

Fter this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeares, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found meanes to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meanes to others to doe the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Saib of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannic wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for seare of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laied betweene these two, that soone found very good fuccesse, being managed thus. Seuen of the banished men for sooke And then privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the evening to the Gateslike hulband-men re-folent and lustfull men, that hee would conveigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Hauing cheared them with fuch hope, and plentic of good wine, hee told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promife, vnleffe they would difmiffe their followers; because the Gentlewomen, who attended without in a chamber, would not endure, that any of the feruants to should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking aduantage of the Gouernours loofe behaviour, flew them all vpon the fodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then prefently calling off their difguife, they went to other places, where faining themselves to come to the Gouernours vpon businesse, they got admittance, and slew those which were of the Lacedamonian faction. By the like deuice they brake into the prifon; flew the Guler; and let at libertie luch as they thought meete, and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants knowne. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the proclamation, thought the Rebells to bee 20 thronger than indeede they were: the Citizens contrariwife mistrusted, that it was a practife to discouer such, as would be forward upon occasion of repoliting. But as foone as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes and befreged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adjoyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the refeue. were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speede to affish their Countrimen, but procured fome Athenians to joyne with them, and thereby came fo strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeelded, more through feare than any necessitie, your condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the 20 Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth-with, and all thinges prepared as earnestly for the recouring of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had been taken from the Lacedamonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her owne libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was fent on this expedition, who having wearied his followers, with a toilefome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leauing Sphodrius, with part of his Armie, at The spies, to intest the Thebans; who doing them fome displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt youn the Hauen of Athens, which failing to take, hee wasted the Countrie adjoyning, and

CHAP. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Lentra to the battaile of Mantinæa.

How Thebes and Athens toyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselnes, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

HE Lacedamonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravitie in all their proceedings, but one difhonorable rule they held, That all respects withftanding the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected; the practife of which doctrine, euen by the best and wifeit of them, did greatly blemish that Estate, but when it was put in execution by infufficient ouerweening men, it feldome failed to bring vpon them in 20 flead of profit vnjuftly expected, both shame and losse. And foit befell them in these enterprises of Phabidas, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Pireus. For howsoeuer Agestlaus did spoile the Countrie about Thebes, in which hee spent two Sommers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise beganne to looke abroade, sailing to the Ile of Coreyra, where they ordered thinges at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea prenailed, began as in the Peloponnesian warre, to surround Peloponnesias with a Nauie; afflicting to the Lacedemonians, that had not the Thebans by their in solencie weatied 30 their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had beene very likely that the end of this warre, should have soone come to a good end, which neverthelesse, being prosequited by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the Citie of Sparts as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroched every day vponher weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had beene dependants upon Athens, and sinding themselues, whilest engaged in such a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resoluted to settle the affaires of Greece, by tenewing that forme of peace which Antaicidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily fignifying, That it was their intent to finish the Warre; to 40 which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadours along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing other wife that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace, which came to paffe, being so wrought by the couragious wisedome of Epaminondas, who understood farre better than his Countrimen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatic the Lacedemonians and Athenians did foone agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Bastians; Agefilaus required them to sweare in their owne name, and to leave the Baotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondus made answere, That the Citic of Sparta should give example to Thebes by fetting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Bxotia did by as good right appertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly Spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agestlaus bearing a vehement hatted vnto those of Thehes, by whom he was drawne back out of Afa into Greece, and disappointed of all the glorie which he had hoped to atchieue by the Persian Warre, did now very pathonately vege that point of fetting the Baotians at libertie, and finding it as obttinately refuted, he datht the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparts lay in Phocis, who received command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which he did, and was there flame at Leučtra, and with him the flowre of his Armie. This battaile of Leučfra being one of the most famous that euer were fought betweene the Greekes, was not fo notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battaile (betweene to which and the conclusion of the generall peacethere passed but twentic daies) the Lacedamonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted farre and neare; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the litle Region of Broise, did now beginne to vndertake the leading and command of many People and Effates, in fuch wife that soone after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much dee the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly indured, advance the affaires of the diffressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxuric, rechlessenesse, and many other vices or vani-20 ties, made ruftie and effeminate.

ð. I I.

How the Athenians tooke upon them to maintaine the peace of Greece. Now troubles hence arifing. Eraminondas inuadeth and wafieth the Territorie of Lacedamon.

He Athenians, refusing to take advantage of this overthrow fallen vppon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedamonians, did neuertheleffe finely give them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themselues the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Ageillaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left unperfect, they affembled the Deputies of all the Litates confederated at Athens; where the general libertie of all Townes, as well fmall as great, was ratified, vnder thestile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon beganne fresh garboiles. The Mantineans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owne pleasure, did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their towne, reedificit, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Areadians, a strong Nation, confishing of many Cities, were 40 diffracted with factions; fome defiring to hold good correspondencie with the Lacedemonians; fome to weaken and keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Latedamonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Areadians, till fuch time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraine helpe. Then was an Armie fent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Teges, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agesilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians, & were become head of the Lecrians, Acarnamians, Euba ans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponne fus in fauor of the Areadians, who had, vpon expectation of their com-30 ming, abstained from giving battaile to Agesilaus. The Armic of the Spartans being difmiffed, and Epeminondas joyned with the Arcadisms; the Region of Laconia was inuaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost fixe hundred yeares were spent, since the Dorians, under the posteritie of Herenles, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time the found of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie: Ten yeares were not fully past fince all Greece was at the deuotion of the Spartans : but now the Region which neither Nerves with his huge Armic could once looke vpon, nor the mightie forces of Albens, and other Enemie States had dared to fet foot on, fauing by Itealth, was all on a light fire, the very fmoke whereof the women of Sparts were alhamed to behold. All which indignitic notwithstanding, the Lacedamonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but lought how to preserve the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Heilores or Slaues, as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, and formwhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to give them fuccour. From Corinth and fome Townes of Peloponnefus they received speedie affiftance; the Athenians came 10 forward more flowly, so that Epaminon dus returned without battaile, having rebuilded the Citic of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedemonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countries, possessing their Territories themselues.

ò. III.

The composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans: who againe inuade and foile Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

my, which was to be raifed, nor any maner of precedence: but fending Embaffadors from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might bee Generalls by Land. This had beene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Marriners and others that were to be imploied at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have ferued under the Lacedemonians. Wherefore it was 20 agreed that the authoritie fhould be divided by time, the Athenians ruling flue daies, the Lacedamonians other five & fo fuccessively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessitie be very flowly aduanced, where confultation, refolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a fecond invalion of Pelapannefus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnable to impeach them, that having fortified 1/thmus from Sca to Sea, as in former times they had done against Aerwes, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Countrie without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by divi- 40 ding the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Areadians confidering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of bodie, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the gouernement, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by encreasing whose greatnest hey should strengthen their owne yoke. Herevpon they began to demeane themselues very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of 50 generall peace having been made (which tooke not effect, because the Citie of Mef-Jene was not abandoned to the Lacedemonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying too much upon their owne worth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as plealing to their Confederates as to their Enemies.

ò. IIII.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Perfian; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embasages.

He Thebans especially rejoyced at the Arcadians misfortune, confide ring, that, without their aide, the fuccesse of all enterprises proued so ill; whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well what focuer they tooke in hand, and were become not only victorious ouer the Lacedamonians, but Patrons ouer the Tieffalians, and proderators of the great quarrells that had rifen in Macedonia, where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Fhilip the Sonne of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Having therefore obtained fuch reputation that little feemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Perflan King, to whom they fent Embaffadour the great and famous Captaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxernes to grant vnto the I hebans all that they 20 defired; whereof two especiall points were, That Atessee thould remaine free from the Lacedamonians, and that the Athenians should forbeare to fend their ships of Warre to Scasonly the later of these two was somewhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the fame time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a fure partie in Greece, did vpon many waightie confiderations refolue, to binde the Thebans firmely vnto him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should bee on that fide his owne fecuritie. The Athenians had beene ancient enemies to his Crowne, and, having turned the profit of their victories ypen the Perfian to the purchase of a 20 great Fflate in Greece, maintained their Signoric in fuch pu ffant manner, that (fundriegricuous misfortunes notwithflarding) they had endured a ten be wa're, wherein the Lacedamonians being followed by mon of the Greeks, and supplied with treafer , and all forts of eide by Darius Kothus, were not able to vanquish them, till their owne indifferction brought them on their knees. The Lacedamonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no fooner established their Dominion at home, than they indertooke the conquest of Asia, from which though, by the commotion raifed in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet having renewed their power, and fetled thinges in Greece, it was not vnlikely, that they should vpon the next advantage have purfued the fame enterprife, had not they been emperched 40 by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwife had alwaies discourred a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedemonians against A hens; And finally having offered much contumely to Agelilans when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Belides all these their good deservings, they were no Sea men, and therefore vnlikely to looke abroade, whereunto if perchance they fhould have any delire, yet were they disabled by the want of good hauen townes, which they could not feize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artanernes did wholly condescend unto the 50 requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as hee might without giving open defiance to the reft of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molefted by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meanes which the Greeks had to diffurbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Effate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the

How all Greece was dinied, betweene the Athenians and Lacedamonians, on the one fide, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

He condition of thinges in Greece at that time did stand thus. Ashens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatnesse drawne all her followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrie, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoynetheir forces against the Thekans, who fought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the partie of these ancient gouerning Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in diflike of those who by strong hand were readie to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not fodainely aspire without some injurie and much enuie. The Citic of Thebes abounding with men whom necessitie had made warlike, and many viflories in few yeares had filled with great spirits, & being so mightic in dependants, that mee had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peleponne us (the Region of Astronand very little part belide excepted) under fuch acknowledgement, as wan-20 ted not much of meere Vaffallage, did hope to bring all Pelopoznefus to the like obedience, wherein alreadie thee had fet good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argines had beene alwaies bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre under them in valour, hauing beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of looling all: which caused them to suspect and enuis nothing more than the greatnesse and honor of Sparta, taking truce with her when shee was attest and had leifure to bend her whole force against them, but firmely joyning with her enemies when focuer they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argines were, in hatred of Sparta, fure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, trans-30 ported with a great opinion of their owne worthinesse, had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedamonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to fend an Armie into Pelaponnefus, before fuch time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And furely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very strange, and seemed no leffe to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the fame time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuertheleffe accept this new

40 Confederacie, not relinquilling the old, because they found that, how socuer these Areadians were enemies to the Lacedamonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to inuade Peloponnesius with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any meanes stay, the comming of epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay upon the 1st hours, and had beene aduer se to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grieuous warre, driven to become Neutrall) tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians. to visit Peloponnesius with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had rifen in Arcidia about confecrated money, which many principall men

<sup>50</sup> among them had laied hands on, under pretence of imploying it to publique vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion, such, as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their handes, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countrimen, as people desirous of innovation. This was done: but the vp-roare Nnnn 3

affaires of Greece beene fo composed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the reft haue transported an Armie, to affift the renolting Satrapa, or Viceroies of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mylia, Lycia, Pilidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phanicia. humane reason can hardly finde the meanes, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruine, which the divine Councell had deterred vnto the daies of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthie Prouinces, wanting a firme bodie of good and hardie Souldiers, was in thort space discussed and vanithed like a mift, without effect; thefe effeminate Afiatiques wearied quickly with the trauailes and dangers incident to warre, for faking the common cause, and each man ftriuing to bee the first that by treason to his companie should both redeeme the 10 former treason to his Prince, & purchase with all his owne promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related. I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; both for that it was like a fuddaine storme, rashly commenced, idlely followed, and foolishly laied downe. having made a great noise without effect, and having small reference to any other action regardable; as also because in the whole raigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre of Cyrus, to the invation of Agypt, I finde nothing (this infurrection and a fruitleffe journey against the Culusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much lesse of dieresfion from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time, patied a- 29 way fo quietly, that he enjoyed the pleafures which an Empire fo great and wealthy could affoord vnto fo absolute a Lord, with little diffurbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domefficall; growing out of the hatred which Paryfatis the Queen-Mother bare vnto his wife Station, and to fuch as had been the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death : vpon whom, when by poifon and mischieuous practises shee had satisfied her feminine appetite of reuenge, thenceforth the wholly applied her felfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the leud defire of marrying his owne Daughter, and filling him with the perfuafion. which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace doe readily entertaine, That his owne will was the supreme law of his subject, and the rule by which all things were 30 to be measured, and adjudged to be good or cuill. In this imaginarie happinesse Pe-Lopidas, and the other Embailadours of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by fo much more affured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne advantage, did feeme to promife, if not the perpetuitie, a long endurance of the fame felicitie to him and his, or (at the leaft) a full fecuritie of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But fuch foundations of eternitic laied by mortall men in this transitorie world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vaine and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raifed to full heighth, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece 40 that had fent Embaffadours to the Perfian. For whereas it had been concluded that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should bee set at libertie, and the Thekans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all controuerlies that might arife, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacie; the Kings letters being folemnely published at Thebes, in the prefence of Embaffadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was required for observation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatoric anfwere was made by the Embassadours, who said that they were sent to heare the articles; not to fweare vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to fend vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had bold- 50 ly refused it, faying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relie vpon their owne swords.

thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the di calians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe scarse pacified. When complaint of the Captaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminon das turned all the blame ypon them who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know. that he would be thortly among them, to judge of their fidelitie, by the affiltance which they should give him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponne-(us. These Lordly wordes did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mightie a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to bee made against themselves. Hercupon such of them as had before fought meanes to fettle the offaires of their Countrie, by drawing thinges to fome good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with fend to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadours to Sparta. by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponne (w. now readie to be inuaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedamonians. who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew that all their forces, and best provisions, would bee no more than very hardly fufficient. For bearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had been accustomed into such a supremacie, as they would in no wife communicate with the powerfull Citic of Athens, till other hope of fecuring their owne Eflate could not be thought vpon) did now veric gently yeeld to the Arcadians, that 29 the command of the Armie in chiefe, should be given, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territoricit lay.

Q. VI. A terrible inualion of Peloponnessus by EPAMINONDAS.

Ertaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a verifirm confent, and vniforme care of the common fafetie. For beful the the great forces railed out of the other parts of George 4, the Arginals, and Olefenans, prepared with all their ftrength to joyne with Epamnondus; who hauing lien a while at Armea, to intercept the Athenians, received there intelligence, that the Armie comming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia belides, forth-with declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be upon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedanionian Captaines to fortific Mantinea with all diligence, and to fend for Agesslaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men, which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held fo good espiall vpon his Enemies, 40 that had not an vinknowne fellow brought haftic aduertifement of his purpole to Age/llaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinea, the Citie of Spata had fodainely beene taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had furely carried the Citie, notwithstanding anie defence that could haue beene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agefilaus in all flying haft got into it with his Companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the refeue as fast as it was able. The arrivall of the Lacedemonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Venta, fo it presented him with a faire aduantage vpon Mantinea. It was the time of Haruest, which made it very likely that the Mantineans, finding the warre to be carried 50 from their walls into an other quarter, would vie the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattaile into their fields, whilest no enemie was neare that might empeach them. Wherefore hee turned away from Sparta to Mantinea, fending his horse-men before him, to seize vpon all that might befound without the Citie. The Ollantineans (according to the expectation of Evaninondas) were scattered abroade in the Countrie; farre more intent upon their haruest-businesse, than you the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselues out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattaile, being vnable to recouer the Towne, were in a desperate case; and the Towne it selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemie should have taken all their provision of victuals with so many of the people, as had not ouer-dearely beene redeemed, by that Cities returning to focietie with Thebes. But at the fame time, the Athenians comming to the fuccour of their Confederates. to whom they thought to have found at Minimes, were very earneftly entreated by the Citizens to refeue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any couragious aduenture to deliuer those who otherwise were given as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to bee the best Souldiers of all the Greeker, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies beene giuen to the Thesialians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour fo wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no necessitie of her owne, but only in denire of relieuing her diffressed friends, they issued forth of Mantinea, not abiding to long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meat, and giving a lu-20 flie charge upon the enemie, who as brauely received them, after a long and hot fight they remained mafters of the field, giving by this victorie a fafe and calle retraitto all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Berotians arrived in the place foone after this battaile, whom the Lacedemonians and their Affiftants were not faire behinde.

VII.

The great battaile of Mantinea. The honourable death of EPAMI-NONDAS, with his commendation.

PAMINONDAS, confidering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Maninea hat ung failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Pelaponnessias, would some vanish, valest by some notable at he should abate their courage in their first grouth, and leaue some memorable character of his expedition 3 resoluted to giue them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to fettle the doubtfull affections of his owne Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weake in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that battaile, wherem victorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and inding the alacritic of his Souldiers to be such, as promised the accomplishment of to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for 40 that battaile, wherein victorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritic of his Souldiers to be fuch, as promifed the accomplishment of his owne defire; he made they of declining the enemie, and intrenching himfelfe in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward strike their fenses with amazement, when hee should come vpon them vnexpected. This opinion deceiued him not. For with veric much tumult, as in fo great and fodaine a danger, the enemie ranne to Armes, necessitic enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that daies service vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie confifted of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the La-50 cedemonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by athird part. The Mantineans (because the warre was in their Countrie) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedemonians : the Athenians had the left wing, the Acheans, Eleans, and others of leffeaccount, filled the bodie of the Armic. The Thebans flood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the La-cedemonians, having by them the Arcadians; the Eubwans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Meficmians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argues held the right wing; the horfe-men on each part were placed in the flancks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could joyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prenailed. notwithstanding the valiant relistance of the Athemans: who not yeelding to the enemie either in courage or skill, were ouer-laied with numbers, and fo beaten upon by The fialian flings, that they were driven to for fake the place, and leave their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the leffe difgracefull, because they kept themfelues together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the to Theban horse to have given them over, and withail discovering some Companies of foot, which had beene fent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake vpon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane scason the battaile of the Athenians had not only to doe with the Argines, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it beganne to open, and was readie to turne back, when the Elean squadron of Horse came up to thereliefe of it, and reflored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedamonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, fo that equall courage and equal loffe on both fides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: 20 vnleffe perhaps the Lacedemonians being very firme abiders, might feeme the more likely to preuaile, as having borne the first brunt, and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practife of a few yeares, cannot bee thought to have gotten a habite fo fure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiving the obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to bee such, as neither the badde successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Bxotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them give one foote of ground; taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied 20 with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their rancks, and cleaue the whole battaile in despight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day wonne by the Thebans, who may justly bee said to have carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, having driven the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the flaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retayning of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable only among the Greekes, and ferued meerely for oftentation, thewing that by the fight they had obtayined fomewhat, which the 40 Enemie could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arriued at the generall immediate end of battaile, none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who for sake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and prowesse. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedemonian esquadron, and forced it to give back in disaray, was furiously charged on the fodaine, by a desperate Companie of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, hee neuertheleffe with a - fingular courage maintayned the fight, vling against the Enemies many of their 50 Darts, which hee drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, hee received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leauing the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his breft. Hereupon hee funke downe, and was soone conneighed out of the fight by his friends; having by his tall fomewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would have got his bodie) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heavie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leaue the field; though long they followed not the chafe, being wearied more with the fadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trausale of the day. Epaminondas being brought into bis Tent, was told by the Philitians, That when the head of the Dart should bee drawne out of his bodie, hee must needes die. Hearing this, hee called for his thield, which to have loft was held a great diffuonour: It was brought vnto him. Hee bad them tell him which part had the victorie; answere was made, to that the Baotians had wonne the field. Then faid hee, it is faire time for mee to die. and withall fent for Iolidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both flaine; which being told him, He aduifed the Thebans to make Peace, whileft with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his bodie; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of iffue, by telling them that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinea were two faire Daughters, in whom his memorie thould line.

So died Epaninondas, the worthieft man that ever was bred in that Nation of  $\tau$ Greece, and hardly to bee matched in any Age or Countrie : for hee equalled all o-20 thers in the feuerall vertues, which in each of them were fingular. His Iustice, and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wifedome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferiour to his Militarie vertue; in energy part whereof hee fo excelled. That hee could not properly bee called a Warie, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Provident Captaine; all these Titles, and many other, being due vnto him, which with his notable Discipline, and good Conduct, made a perfeet composition of an Heroique Generall. Neither was his private Conversation vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroade. For hee was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curteous; resolute in publique bufinesse, but in his owne particular case, and of much mildnesse; a louer of his People, bearing 20 with mens infirmities, wittie and pleafant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities that might winne and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into fuch effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had euer-more beene an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoyning, and the highest command in Greece.

VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battaile of Mantinea. The voiage of AGESILAVS into Ægypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made betweene him and POMPEY the Roman.

His battaile of Mintinea was the greatest that had ever beene fought in that Countrie betweene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platea, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Grecien valeur; neither were the practicof Armes and Art Militarie so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnessan Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were vidertaken against forraine enemies, prouing for the most part vnfortunate. But in this lait fight all Greece was interessed, which never had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor euer contended for victoric with greater care of the fuccesse, or more obtainate resolution. All which notwith standing, the iffue being fuch as hath beene related, it was found bett for every particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, every one retayning what hee presently had, and none being forced to depend upon an other. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new loague; which caused the Lacedamonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conc.ution; confidering that Spare, was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and 10 therefore might well bee allowed to lhew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to deciare it felfe in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Countrie, so to the Cities of Athensand Sparta it affoorded lessure to feeke after wealth by forraine emploiment in Fgppt, whither Ageflaus was fent with fome small torces to affilt, or indeede, as a Mercenaric, to serve vnder Taches King of Agypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under steeris King of £gypt, went now as a voluntarie, with fuch forces as he could raife, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same service. These Agyptian Kings descended from Amyrtaus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nothis, having retained the Countrie notwithstanding all intestine differntions, and 20 forraine inuations, during three Generations of their owne race, were fowell acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (cafily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not only to affure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might have been, had it not failen by Domesticall rebellion, it is vicertaine. But very likely it is that the rebellion it felfe had foone come to nothing, if Agestlaus had not proud a falle Traitor, joyning with Nectanebus who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebell with that Armie which the money of Taches had waged. This fallhood Agefilan excust d, as tending to the good of his owne Countrie; though it feeme rather, that hee grudged because the King 30 tooke vpon himfelle the Conduct of the Armie, vling his feruice only as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall Howfocuerit came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betraied by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Perfian, who vpon his fubmiffion gaue him gentle entertainement; and Nectarelus (who feemes to have beene the Nephew of Tachos) raigned in his flead. At the fame time the Citizens of Mendes had fet up another King, to whom all, or most of the Agyptians yeelded their obedience. But Age ilam fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so farre, that hee left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of histreason to the former King Tachos, and good feruice done to himfelfe, rewarded him with 40 two hundred and thirtie Talents of filuer, with which bootic failing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and voliant and a good Leader in warre, free from couetou ineffe, and not reproched with any blemifh of luft; which praifes are the leffe admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparia was fuch as did enduceueric one of the Citizens (not caried away by the violent streame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. Hee was neutrtheleffe very arrogant perucrfe, vnjust, and vaine-glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obitinately profecuting those courses whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne; with which conceipt being transpor- 50 ted, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, hee did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere necefficie to grow warlike, and able, to the vtter dilhonour of Sparta, and the irreparable loffe of all her former greatnesse. The commendations given to him by Nenophon his good friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name in the ballance against pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemne granitie of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truly say, That as Pompey made great warres under fundric Climates, and in all the Prouinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imploiments all that were before him; to Agefilaus had at > one time, or other some quarrell with eueric Towne in Greece, had made a Warre in Alia, and medled in the businesse of the Agyptians, in which varietie he went beyond all his Predeceffours : yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did manie, but obtayning large wages, which Pompey neuer tooke. Herein alfo they are very like; To Each of them was the last great Captaine which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrie by his owne Lordly wilfulnesse. We may therefore well say, Similia magis ownia quam paria; Thereforeblance was nearer than the equalitie. Indeede the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the handes of Cafar, whom he had enforced to take Armes; vet the Roman Empire stood, the forme of Gouernement only being changed, But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparta it felfe, was not forfaited vnto the Thebans, whom Age/laws had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of Sparta was prefently loft: and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much bloud loft ill healed by the peace enfaing, did very foone vpon the death of Jeellaus give vp the Ghoft, and the Lordfhip of the whole Countrie was feized by Thilp King of Mueedon, whose actions are now on foore, and more to bee regarded than the Contemporarie paffages of thinges, in any other Nation.

HE Greeks, of whom wee haue alreadie made large difcourfe, not as yet wearied with intefline Warre, nor made wife by their vaine contention for fuperioritie, doe lill, as in former times, continue the inualion and vallation of each other.

Againit Aroxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their libertie, with as happie success, as cuer Nation had, and with no lesse home, than hath cuer been equired by deeds of Armes. And hauing had a triall, and experience, more than fortunate, a-

this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each of ther, when the fait-growing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their owne safeties, have served them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the glorie of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purpoles of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakned them, and wonne upon them, that they were not (as the Greenas perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover their owne, much leffe to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeede, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decaied and broken banks, when great Rivers are once (wollen, fast running, and inraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking downe those defences, which stood between them and this inundation: than leeke to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Leuell of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was there-

The Kingdome of Mucedon, so called of Mucedon, the Sonne of Ofric, or, as other Authors affirme, of Jupicer and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Agean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-weff, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and Southwest, by Thestalie and Evirus.

Their Kings were of the familie of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argines; who are lifted as followeth. About some fixe yeares after the translation of the Affirian Empire, Arbaces then gouerning Media; Caranas of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Countrie, the weather being raynic 20 and tempetuous, he espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the florme as fast as they could, hafting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranto, calling to minde, that he had also by an other Oracle beene directed, to follow the first

Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Ciffeus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie yeares. Canus succeeded Caranus, and raigned twelve yeares. Tyrimas followed Canus, and ruled eight and twentie Perdiesas the first, the some of Trimes, governed one and fiftie yeares; a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Juffine, Exfebius, Theophilus Antiochenus, and others affirme, that he appointed a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macroon his Successours, at Age: affuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is faid that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenide failed in him: a thing rather denifed after the effect, as I conceine, than foretold by Perdicas. Philip the first, his succession, raigned eight and twentie yeares.

Europus tollowed Philip, and gouerned fixe and twentie yeares; in whose infancie the Illyrians inuaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victorie they pursued the fame to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resoluing either to recouer their former losse, or to loose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not bee beaten (their King present;) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so voide of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natu- Engle. Alcetas succeeded Aropus, and ruled nine and twentie yeares.

Amontas the first succeeded A'ceras, and raigned fiftie yeares; Heeliued at such to time as Darius Hyfraffes, after his vnprosperous returne out of Seythia, lent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Americas to acknowledge him for his Supreame Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Emballadours, as you have heard before, were, for their infolent behaviour towards the Officedoman Ladies, flaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the forme of Her. Enfanthing Amontas, and his Succeffour.

Alexander, furnamed the rich, the sonne of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and fortie yeares. He did not only appeale the wrath of Gingabazus, for the flaughter of the Fe firm imballadours, by giving Gyges his Silter, to Bubares of the bloud of Perfia, but by that match he grew fo great in Nerves grace, as he obtained all that 20 Region betweene the Mountaines of Olyn pus and Hemus, to bee vnited to the Kingdome of Mice on. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greeker.

For Nerves being returned into Afra, and Mardonius made Generall of the Persian Ar-Her.13. mic; Alexander acquainted the Greekes with all his intents and purpoles against Plateuleb. them. He had three Sonnes, Perd coss, Alcetas, and Philip. Perdicess the second, the sonne of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian Warre, and raigned in all eight and twentie yeares. The Warres which hee made were not much remarkeable; the Storie of them is found here and there by peeces, in Thuey lides his first lixe bookes. He left behinde him two fonnes; Per dicess, who was very yong, and Archelaus who was base borne.

30 Perdicon the third, being deliuered to the custodie and care of Archelaus, was at feuen yeares of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false guardian : who excufing this fact to Cleepatra the Mother of the yong King, faid, That the child in fol- Platin Emg: lowing a Goose hastily fell thereinto by misaduenture. This Archelaus, of whom both Plate and Ariffelle make mention, though hee made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet he performed many thinges greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is faid, That hee fought by all meanes to draw Socrates 40 vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two lonnes, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelius the second succeeded his Father, and having raigned seven yeares, hee was flaine in hunting, either by chance or of purp sle, by Crateus.

Orefles his yonger fonne was committed to the education of Fropus, of the roiall bloud of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupill; for Frogus murdered him and vfurped the Kingdome, which he held fome fixe yeares: the same who denied passage to Agestlans King of Sparta, who desired after his returne from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

This V furper left three fonnes, Paufanias, Argens, and Alexander. Paufanias fue-pied. raigned (though very viiquietly) foure and twentic yeares; for he was not only infelted by Paulanias, aififted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argeus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the faid Argaus, for two yeares dispossed of Macedon: but on the other lide, the Olynthians, his Neighbours neare the Agaan Sea, made themselues for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citie of Alacedon.

Amyntas the second had by his Wife Eurydice, the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the focond, Perdice is the third, and Philip the fecond, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: He had also by his second wife Gyges three Sonnes; Archelaus, Argens, and Monelaus, afterward flaine by their brother Philip, He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie, furnamed Alorites, of the Citie Alorus, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the fecond raigned not much about one years, in which time he was inuaded by Paulinia, the lonne of Frepus, but defended by Iphicrates the Albinian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great fumme of money) to leave his yongest brother Philip in Hestage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the paiment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being innited by the Alexande against Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres in The falle, having redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thehans to his affiltance entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the fame Countrie, with whom he also left Philip with divers other principall persons for the 20 gage of his promifes to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother failing in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practized the death of Alexander her fonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomic Alorstes did put in execution : by meanes whereof hee held Macedon for three yeares, but was soone after slaine by Perdice as the brother of Diod.15.6 16 Alexander. Diodor hath it otherwise of Philips being made pledge; and faith, That Amyntus his Father delinered him for hoftage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conucied to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his Father was yet lining) was first ingaged to the Thebans, and delinered for hostage a second time by Alexander his Brother.

Perdice as the third, after he had flaine Alorites his base-brother, gouerned Mace-30 don fine yeares, and was then flaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but lustine affirmeth, that he perilhed by the practife of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

building of Rome three hundred fourescore and thirteene yeares: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was inuironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdice.us left a fonne, though but an Infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition foone ouer-grew his modestie, and he was easily perswaded by the people to 50 accept both the Title of King, and withall the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to fay the truth, The necessitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. These heavie burdens when Pollip could not well beare, he bought off the waightieft by money, and by faire promifes valoded himfelfe of fo many of the reft, as he ranne under the remainder happily enough. The good successe which PHILIP had in many enterprises.

Ow had Philip leifure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Paonians, his irreconciliable enemies and borderers : both which he inuaded with fo prosperous successe, as hee slew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with feuen thousand of his Nation, and thereby recour-

This was no fooner done, than (without flaying to take longer breath) he hasted speedily towards Larisia, vpponthe River Peneus in Theffalie, of which Towne he foone made himfelfe mafter; and thereby he got good footing in that Countrie, whereof he made vie in time following. Now although hee refolued either to fubdue the Theffalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Countrie were the 40 best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safetie to close vp the entrances out of Thrace, least while hee inuaded Thessale and Greece towards the South those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either with draw him, or ouer-runne Macedon as in former times He therefore attempted Amphipolis, feated on the famous R juer of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Mace, on. and wonne it. Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greekes, he tooke the faire occasion to deliuer the Citie of Pheres in The Salie, from the tyrannic of Lycophron and Tifiphonus. Which act of Philip did for cuerafter fatten the Theffalians vnto him, and to his exceeding great advantage, binde them to his feruice.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew PHILIP into Greece.

Bout this time, to wit, in the second years of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeares after the battaile of Mantinaa, and about the eighth years of Artaxernes Ochus, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall prouidence, and of enery great alteration in the World there is some 20

preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned, so did this revengefull hatred by the Thebans, Theffalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, nor only teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselves beating downe their owne defences, to give him an eatle passage, and beating themselves, to give him victorie without perill, left nothing unperformed towards their owne flauerie, fauing the title and impolition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made ouer-proude by their victorie at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the generall Effates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swaied most, they caused both the Lacedomonians and Phocians to bee condemned in greater fummes of money than they could 30 well beare; the one for furpriling the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phoeians being resolved not to obay this Edict, were secretly set on and incouraged by the Lacedemonians: and for refufall were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accurled, to all their Neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleafures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the fame dice of hazard that Cafar after many Ages following did; but had not the fame chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngratious quarrell, of which there was left no 40 hope of composition, they resolved to fack the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a peece of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their neighbour-God, and their neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than alreadie was intended; they refolued to take the gold with the ground, and either to perifh for all, or to prevaile against all that had commission to call them to accompt. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the warre was ten thousand talents, which in those daies served them to wage a great many men, and fuch was their fuccesse in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebans, Thesialians, and Locrisms, but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himselfe head-long over the Rocks.

In the meane while the Cities of Cher (one (us, both to defend them selues against their bad-Neighbour Philip, who encroched upon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselues to the Athensans. Philip prepareth to get them into his handes, and at the fiege of Methone loft one of his cies. It is faid, That hee that that him did purposely direct his Arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shafe thereof: After PHILIPPO; After to PHILIP; for so he was called Plat. Vipian. that gaue him the wound. This Citic he euened with the foile.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was bufied on the border of Thrace, and the The Salians ingaged in the holy Warre, entred The Salians ingaged in the holy Warre, forces, being affifted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped to entertaine the The Salians at home. as they should not finde leifure to inuade them. Hereupon was Philip the second time called into Theffalie, but both the Thefialians, and Macedonians, ( Philip being 10 prefent) were vtterly ouerthrowne by Onomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations loft. From Theffalse, Onomarchus drew speedily towards Baotia, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Baotians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip impatient of his late misaduenture, after hee hadre-enforced his Armie, returned with all speede into The Salie, there to finde against he honour which he lately loft; and was the second time incountred by onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foote, and fine hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armic ouerturned, lixe thousand flaine, and three thousand taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged 20 by Philip. Those that fled were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which failed alongst the coast, commanded by Chares, but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein deuoured ere they reconcred them. Lycophron was now againe driuen out of Thesidie, and Pheres made free as before.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practifes of PHILIP.

Rom hence Philip resolued to inuade Phoeis it selfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lacedamonians they retrencht his pallage at the Straits of Thermopylis. Wherevpon hee returned into Obaceson, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Townes, hee quarrelled with the olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the olynthians were very strong, and had euermore both braued and beaten the Macedonians. It is faid that Philip having put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amyntes had three fonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other fonnes by Gyg.es: but Philips elder brothers by the fame Mother being dead, he determined to rid himfelfe also of the rest) the two yonger held themselues 40 within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the warre, Iustine affirmeth. But just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, forto Justile. × this King all thinges were lawfull that might any way ferue his turne; all his affections, and passions, how divers some rin other men, were in his ambition swallowed vp, and thereinto conuerted. For hee neither forbare the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie, hee effected no place ftrong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter, Nor any Citie or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest to be madegreater, could loose the sense of other mens forrow and subjection. And because hee thought it vaine to practise the winning of Ofnthus, till hee had inclosed all the power they had within their owne 50 walls, he entred their Territoric, and by the advantage of a well-compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere hee fate downe before the Citie it selfe: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthbenes from their people, and from the seruice of their Countrie and Common weale, by whose treason hee entred the Towne, flew his brothers therein, fackt it, and fold the Inhabitants for flaues by the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly inriched himselfe, and had treasure fulficient to buy in other Cities withall, which be daily did. For fo was hee adulfed Ly the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That hee flould make his affaults + with filter speares: Whereupon tiorace well and truly said.

By gifts the Macedon claue Gates a-funder, And Kings enuying his effate brought under.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his secret workers ( which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spaine: ) So when in the contention betweene the Competitors for the Kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie, and Iustice, but with a powerfull Armie, and having beaten and flaine both Kings, gave fentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

How PHILIP ended the Phocian Warre.

He warre still continuing betweene the Phecians, and the Associates of the holy Warre, the Barotians, finding themselves vnable to sublist without some present aide, sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men yeelded to their necessaries, and text their enemies, nor to affice them as were neither fufficient to mafter their enemies, nor to affice them.

felues; but yet to inable them to continue the warre, and to waste the strength of 30 Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirtie talents, which makes a hundred and four efcore thousand Crownes, but when with these supplies they had still the worst in all their attempts against the Phocians, who held from them three of their firongest Cities within Baotia it selfe, They then befought Philip of Macedon that hee would affift them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territorie, and in all things obay his commande-

Now had Philip what he longed for ; for he knew himselfe in state to give the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedie pace towards Baotia, where being arrived, Phalleens who commanded the 40 Phocian Armie, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and with-drew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Pelopomelus, leaving the Phocians to the mercie of the Conquerour, and for conclusion he had the glorie of that Warre called Sacred, which the Greeians with fo many mutual! flaughters had continued for ten yeares, and, besides the glorie, he posses himselfe of orchomene, Coronea, and Corfia, in the Countrie of the Baotisms, who inuited him to be victorious ouer themselucs. Hee brought the Phocians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gaue them but their Villages to inhabite, referuing to himselfe the yearely tribute of threefcore talents, which make fixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. Hav PHILIP with ill successe attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

HILLIP after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmenio, flaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians, and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their reuennues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians stated his furie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thrace, seated vpon Propontis, in the mid-way betweene Seitos and Byzantium, a place of great fireigth, and a people refolued to detend their libertic against Philip, where the Athensans incouraged and affifted them. Philip fate downe before it with a puiffant Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious affaults, built many ouer-topping and commanding Towers about it. But hee was repel'd with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall affaults to wearie them, and walte both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sca-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhoaes, by the conduction 20 of Phocion, with whatfocuer was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their Neighbourhood, and the casie passage by water gaue them often and readic helpe; Philip removed with the one halfe of his Armie and belieged it, leaning fifteene thouland foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; but to be short, hee failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vnder-take divers enterprises at one time) and returned into Aucdon with no leffe dishonour than loffe: whereupon he made an Ouerture of peace with the A! benians, and greatly defired it, to which though Photion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions; Yet Demoglihenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refufall. In the meane while, Philip 20 having digetted his late affront, and supplied his expence by the taking of an hundred and three score and ten Marchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne A'exander, lead them into Seythia; but he was also vnprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Arlia, set on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

How PHILIP ouerthrowing the Greekes in the battaile of Cheronea, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of

Mong these Northren Nations (part of which hee supprest, and part quieted) hee spent some eight yeares, and in the ninth yeare, after the end of the holy Warre, he was to his great aduantage in uited againe by the Gracians to their affiftance. For the Citizens of Amphifa hauing disobased the decree of the Amphyetiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Locrians gaue countenance and aide to the Amphiseniums, the rest were not of themselves able to constraine them, they belought 50 Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in refoluing upon this enterprife; hee needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe back; nor other diffwafion than a mastring power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirtie thousand foote, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wanne Plates, and brought into fully jection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to search that a great part of this storme would fall on themselves, yet were they disswaded by Demolthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered. and rather made choise (having drawne the Thebans to joyne with them) to leave the injoying of their estates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Orators eloquence cost them deare. It is true that he could farre more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, then make them to be such as they were. Hee might to repeate vnto them (with wordes mouing paffion) the wonders they wrought at Marathen, but hee could not transforme the Macedonians into Perfians, nordraw from the dead, a Mittades, an Aristides, a Themificeles, or a Cimen, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had paied with the greatest ingratitude that euer Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrarie faction hee was at this time in difgrace, and not imploied: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although fome thousand of the Athenians abid the killing, and the like number well neare of the Theban, gied with them; yet the want of worthie men on that fide to hold up the reft, and to draw them on, and the many choife Captaines of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King 20 of a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip fo thining a victorie that Accounter withe light thereof found his way (in despight of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia, India, and Agypt; fo it cut to the ground, and gaue end and date to all the Gracian glorie: Yea their libertie (faith Curtins) with their large Lominion wonne with fo many difficulties, continued for formany Ages, and fo often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for our lost.

Now this aduised King (neuer passionate to his disaduantage) to the end hee might obtaine the Soueraignetic ouer all Greece and be acknowledged for their Captaine-Generall against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Atherians that were taken at this battaile of Cle ones, as he also 20 forbare to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed over the rest) hee lodged a Garrison of Macedonisms. And being foone after (according vnto the long defire which he had nourished of this Soueraignetie) by the generall States at Cormth, stilled The first Commander of all the Gracians, and contribution of men and money granted him, hee compounded an Armie of great strength, and under the commandement of attalia and Parmenio, transported the same over the Hellespont into Ala, to beginne the Warre. Of his enterprise against Persia hee fought the successe from the Oracle at velybes, from whence he received fuch an other convertible riddle, as Cra/to did when hee attempted Cyrus, and was in like fort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discerne and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites. fo did Philips ambitious defire to inuade Perfia abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatned, he understood to be delinered of his enemie, whom he intended prefently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Alia, hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feaft and pastimes thereat appointed hec inuited all his Friends, and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich presents; but this was indeede the feast of his Funerall. For having refused to doe justice to one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly fauoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then 50 left to be carnally abused by divers base persons, This Paulanias grew into sogreat detestation of the Kings partialitie in so fowle a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a fword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had lived fixe and fortie yeares, and raigned five and twentie.

juffine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Paulannas to murder the King her huf- infl.19. band, which after his death thee boldly answed, by the honour flee did vnto Paufantas in crowning his dead bodie, in confecrating his fword vnto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of ALEXANDERS greatnesse were laied by PHILLIP. of his landable qualities, and iffue.

ഉത്തു 😋 Ow although he were then taken from the World, when he had mafired all oppolition on that fide the Sea, and had feene the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards ripeneffe, and perfection, yet he was herein happie that he lived to fee his fonne Alexander at mans estate, and had himselfe been an eie-witnesse of his resolution, and lingular valour in this last battaile.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laied so soundly for him, with fo plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more casie to Alexander, though more glorious than 20 the beginnings were vnto Philip, though leffe famous. For belides the recourse of Macedon it felie, in competition betweene him and the fonnes of Eropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places possess by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northeen Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olynthus, a State that dispised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vpon them; Hee left vnto his fonne, and had bred vp for him, fo many choise Commanders, as the most of them both for their valour and judgement in the Warre were no lesse wor-20 thie of Crownes, than himfelfe was that ware a Crowne: For it was faid of Parmenio (whom Alexander, vngratefull to fo great vertue, impioufly murdered) That Parmenie had performed many thinges challenging eternall fame, without the King, * but the King, without Parmenio, neuer did any thing worthie of renowne; as for the restoshis Captaines, though content to obay the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to therafelnes.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature, and his excellent Education had inriched him with vertues. For belides that He was Valiant, Wife, Learned, and Mafter of his 40 Affections, he had this fauour of Pictic, that he rather laboured to fatisfic those that, were grieued, than to suppresse them, Whereof (among many other) wee finde a good example in his dealing with Arcadion , and Vicanor ; whom, when for their euill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death; Hee answered them, That first it ought to bee considered, whether the fault were in them that gauchimill language, or in himfelfe: Secondly, that it was in every mans owne powertobee well spoken off; and this was shortly proued, for after Philip had relieued their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon hee told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that hee was a better Philition for cuill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his fonne are remembred by Cicero, and Gellius; and Cic.Off.2. by Dion: and Chryfostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered Diona, de Rei by Polyenus and Frontings, his wife fayings by Plutarch, And albeit hee held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his raigne, yet was he not the true and next > Heirethereof: for Amyntas the fonne of his Brother Perdice to (of whom he had the protection protection during his infancie) had the right. This simples hee married to his Daughter Cyma, who had by him a Daughter called Emydice, who was married to Philips bale fonne stridens, her Vncle by the mothers-fide: both which olympa, Philips first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death; Atlaus by extreme torments: Emydice thee throughed.

Philip had by this Ofmpiss the Daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molofism, (of the race of Achies) Accorded the Great and Cleopatra, Cleopatra was married to her Vincle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her Brother Alexanders death flaine at Sardus, by the commandement of Aniegonus.

By Andata, an Illyrian, his second wise, hee had Cyna, married as is shewed 10 before.

By Nieslipolis, the Sifter of Islan, Tyrant of Pheres, hee had The falonics, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married, but shee was afterward by her Father-in-law Anipater put to death.

By Cleontra, the Necce of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him, 1184.1.3.4.3. Olympia, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a coper Pan. Others lay this murder on Alexander himselfe. By the same Cleopatre hee had likewise a Daughter, called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers breast.

By Phila and Meda he had no iffue.

Hee had allo two Concubines, Africe, whom, after he had gotten with child, hee married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Protome. King of Agypt, called the sonne of Lagus, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philimsa, his second Concubine, a publike Dancer, he had Arideus, of whom wee shall have much occasion to speake hereafter.

CHAP. II. Of ALEXANDER the Great.

ģ. I

A briefe rehearfall of ALEXANDERS doings, before hee imaded Afia.

Lexander, afterward called the Great, fucceeded vnto Philip his Father; being a Prince no leffe valiant by Nature, than by Education, well influeded, and intiched in all forts of Learning and good Arts. He began his raigne ouer the Macedonians four chundred and feuenteene yeares after Reme built, and after his owne birth twentie yeares. The firange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the Gods, in the fhape of a Snake, begat him on Ofmpiss his Mother, 19 I omit as foolith tales; but that the Temple of Dianz (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt upon the day of his birth, and that fo flrange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three feuerall victories, obtained by the Macedoniam, it was very remarkeable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, and forethewing the great thinges by Aexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had opprest, beginne to confult about the recouerie of their former libertie, and to aduenture it by force of Armes. Alexanders young-year s gaue them hope of prenailing, and his suspected feueritie increased courage in those, who could better resolue to die, than to live slauithly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might specdily have endangered the health of his effate. For after revenge taken you the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tombe; and the celebra-10 tion of his Funeralls, hee first fastened vnto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions, and bodily flauerie, other than their feruice in his warres; and vfed such Kingly austeritie towards those that contemned his yong yeares, and such elemencie to the reit that perswaded themselves of the crueltie of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, He made a prefent journey into Peloponne jus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Counsell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great defire of his heart, elected Captaine-Generall against the Persians, vpon which warre Philip his Father had not only resoluted, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmenie, and Attalia, a part of his Armie, to recouer some places on 20 Alis-fide, for the fafe descent of the rest.

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire markes of riches, Honour, and large Dominion, hee now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either gricuous or hatefull. But a contrarie winde ariseth; for hee receiveth advertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedemonians, had vnited themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recoucie of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosibenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the deute he vied was more fubtile than profitable, for he caused it to be bruted that Miexander was flaine in a battaile against the Triballes, and brought into the affern-30 bly a Companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, That himfeife was prefent and wounded in the battaile. There is indeede a certaine Doctrine of Policie (as __ Policie is now a-daies defined by falfhood and knauerie) that deuifed rumours and lies, if they ferue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly availeable. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarums in the Warres; but in all that I have observed, I have found the successe as ridiculous as the invention. For as those that finde themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and inoccasions perilous, summoned to affemble; so doe all meningeneral condemne

the Venters of fuch trumperic, and for them feare ypon necessarie occasions to en-40 tertainethe truth it felfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not only very gricuous to **liex**adar**, but by turning his fivord from the ignoble and effemnate **Perjam**, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Gratians*, of whose affishance he thought himselfe affured, his present vndertaking was greatly disordered But he that cannot indure to firtuagainst the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which heep purposeth to recouer: and it no lesse becommend the worthielt men to oppose missortunes, than it doth the weakest children to be waile them.

He therefore made fuch expedition towards these Revolters, as that himselfe, with the Armie that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. 19 Hereupon all stager, and the *Athexius*, as they were the first that moued, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacific the King, and to be received againe into his grace. *Alexander was not long in resoluting; sforthe Persons personaded him to pardon the Gracium. Wise men are not cally drawne from great purposes by sinch occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King cuer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himfelfe in many enterprifes at once, not tending to one and the fame certaine end.

The fourth Booke of the first part CHAP.2. S.I.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he refolued to affure those Nations which iav on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Tilballes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other faluage people, which had greatly vexed with incurtions, not only other of his Predeceffours, but cuen Philip his Father: with all which after divers overthrowes given them, hee made peace, or elfe brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than libertie; the Greekes had enjoyed it ouer-long, and loft it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the yeke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander halteth to their fuccour, and prefents himfelte with thertie thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horse, before the Citie, and gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolue, being even heart-sicke with the delire of passing into Ajia. So viwilling, indeede, he was to draw bloud of the Gracians, by whom hee hoped to ferue himselfe elsewhere, that hee offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliuer into his hands Phanix and Prothytes. the flirrers vp of the Rebellion. But they, oppoling the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all reliftance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sea) in fleed of fuch an answere, as men belieged and abandoned should have made, deman- 20 ded Philotas and Antipater to bee deliucred vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then laied in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon and many other Prouinces, could either have evened the scale or swated it. Therefore in the end they perithed in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie affailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, fixe thousand flaine, and thirtie thousand fold for flaues, at the price of four hundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Gra-

Many Arguments were vied by Cleuds; one of the prisoners, to perfusade Alexander to forbeare the destruction of Thebes. He praied the King to believe that they were rather missel-ed by giving halfice-recedit to falls reports, than any way malicious for being persuaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Succession. Hee also belough the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citie, yea that his Ancestor Hereises was borne therein: but all persussions were fruitlesse, the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggruute them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Prindsruth Poet, and spared, and set at libertie Timeslea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the libertie of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noble-woman being taken by a Thrasian, and by him raussished, he extreasted to take her life unself she would confesse her treasses, she had therein cash; and when the Thrasian to a Well, and told him that 40 she bad therein cash; and when the Thrasian Rooped to looke into the Well, shee sheddainly thrush him into the mouth the reco, and though though the death.

Now because the Athenians had received into their Citie so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and fled vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but vpon condition to deliuer into his hands both their Orators which persuaded this second revolt, and their Captaines; yet in the end it being a torment vnto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill adulted, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the restance against him vnprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Greeians betooke 50 themselves to the secretary of the Persian, whom after a few daies he intundeth.

ò. I I.

How ALEXANDER passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the Ruser of Granicus.

Hen all was now quieted at home, Mexander, committing to the truft of Antipater both Greece and Mucedon, in the first of the Spring did passet to tellespont, and being readic to disimbarke, her threw a Dart towards the Min shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any wast in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or defice those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to posselfe. He landed his Armie, confishing of two and thirtie thousand foot, and fine thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neare vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne facrifice you stabiles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his owne coaft, he put to death, without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinfmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing fuch of his owne as he sufficiently. He had been been been all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrarie to offere all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrarie to the policie which his Ambition had commended who him, though agree has verienced well with the justice of God, for all that he had planted, was soone after with red, and rooted up; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; if mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercies the Govern as his owne, and all manner of confusion followed his dead bodie to the graue, and left bim there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Alia-fide was brought to Parim, he fo much Corned the Armie of Macedon, and had fo contemptible an opinion of Alexander himfelfe, as having thicked him his feruant on a letter which hee wrote wrohim, reprehending his difficialtic and and actite (for Darius intitled himfelfe King of Kings, and the Kinfman of the Gods) hee gaue order withall to his Lieute-30 nanes of the leffer Alia, that they should take Alexander a-liue, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his presence: that they should linke his ships, and fend the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Lethiopia, or some other vnhealthfull part of Alirica. In this fort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartleffe, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the alreadic-vanquished Macedonians ; But the ill destinies of men beare them to the ground, by what strong confidence soener armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding aduantage to his enemies, than any difcouragement at all. For belides that they were men vtterly vnacquainted with dan-40 gers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to pregaile against those of leffe courage than themselves, men that tooke more care how to embroder with gold and filture their upper garments, as if they attended the invafion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselves with yron and fteele against the sharpe-pikes, swords, and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say befides all thefe, even the opinion they had of their owne numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled enery of them with the care of their owne fafetic, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Otitedanians as they came to fight, and thereby to inrich themselves with the gold and 50 jewells of Persia, both which they needed, so the Persians who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obaied the King; who had power to constraine them in affembling themselves for his service; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power ouer them, they only then obaied, when their rebellion against so seruile a passion did justly and

violently require it. For faith V & GETIVS: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles pras. lium cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam feiendum est in pugna ofum amplicus prodesse quam vires; As the well-practifed Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one scares it : for we must understand, that in fight it more auxiles to have been execustomed unto the like than only to have rude firength What manner of men the Perfians were, Alexander diffcour red in the first encounter, before which time it is faid, by those that writh is Storie. That it was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the Conqueit of an Empire to well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the fuccesse he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which severeth the Territoric of Tree from Propontis, the Perfuns fought to ftop his passage, taking the higher ground and 100 banck of the river to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime vp vpto and scale from the Levell of the water; Great relistance (faith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it seemes to mee, that the victoriethen gotten was exceeding calie, and that the twentie thousand Perlan foot-men, faid to be flaine, were rather kil'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by resisting. For had those twentie thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or, after Platarch, two thousand and fine hundred horse-men, died with their faces towards the Micedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lines at fo small a rate, as with the losse of foure and thirtie of all forts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutareh doth report, how Alexander encoun- 29 tred two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Persaces; and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly how those Grecians in Darius his pay holding themselves in one bodie vpon a peece of ground of advantage, did (after mercie was refused them) fight it out to the last: how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance having beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelve Foote-men, and two and twentie

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battaile of Granick,

He winning of this paffage did greatly encourage the Mucedonians, and brought fuch terrour vpon all those of the lesser Ajia, as hee obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, fome one or two Townes excepted. For in all inuations, where the Nations inuaded have once beene beaten vpon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Riuers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will foone have perswaded themselves, that fuch an enemie, vpon equal termes and euen ground, can hardly be refifted. It was 50 therefore Aschiauels counsell, that he which resolueth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are fo well fenced, that Armies, of fuch force as may be thought sufficientto conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wates. One paffage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Countrie be distracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakely. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we finde that euer they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they fuch, as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they give no fecuritie to those that lie beninde them: for 59 they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lumbardie perswaded themselves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had vndertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchic of eMilan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those Mountaines

Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custodic of the Alpes; Francu appeared in Lumbardie, to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the leffe they had expected his arrivall. What thall we fay of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such fort, as they leave but one Gate open ? The Streights, or (as they were called) the Gates of Taurus in Citicia, and those of Thermopyla, have seldome beene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable : but how feldome (if euer) haue they been attempted in vaine? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermoppie; Cyrus the yonger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide 10 open; how strongly soener they had beene locked and barred, yet were those countries open enough to a fleet that thould enter on the back-fide. The defence of Riuers how hard a thing it is, wee finde examples in all histories that beare good witneffe. The deepelt have many Foords; the fwifteit and broadeft may bee paffed by Boates, in cale it be found a matter of difficultie to make a Bridge. He that hath men enough to defend all the length of his owne banke, hath also enough to beate his enemie; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his loff, than by striuing in vaine to hinder the pallage, as a matter tending to his owne disaduantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their meanes of fafeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of fuch as are too 20 good for them. Certainely if a River were fufficient defence against an Armie, the lile of Mona, now called Anglefey, which is divided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea; had beene fafe enough against the Romans, inuading it under conduct of Inlins Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making vesfells to transport his forces, did affay the foords. Whereby her fo amazed the enemies attending for thips and fuch like prouision by Sea, that furely believing nothing could bee hard or inuincible to men, which came fo minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Yet the Britaines were men flout enough; the Perlians verie dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the River of Granick in face 20 of the enemie; not marching higher to feeke an eafier way, nor labouring to conucy his men ouer it by some fafer meanes. For having beaten them vpon their owne ground, heedid thereby cut off no leffe of their reputation, than of their firength, leauing no hope of fuccour to the partakers and followers of fuch vnable Pro-

Soone after this victoric he recoursed Sardis, Ephefus, the Cities of the Trailians and Mignesia, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which with the people of the Countrie, he received with great grace, fuffering them to be governed by their owne lawes. For hee observed it well; Novam Imperium inchoantibus viilis elementia fama; It is commodious onto fuch as lay the foundations of a new Soueraignetie -40 to have the fame of being mercifull. Hee then by Parmenio wanne Miletus, and by force maîtred Hilicarnaffus, which, because it relisted obstinately, hee razed to the ground. From thence hee entred into Caria, where Adathe Queene, who had beene cast out of all that thee held (except the Citie of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her felfe vnto him, and adopted him her fonne and successor; which Alexander accepted in fo gracious part as hee left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. Hee then entred into Lycia, and Pamphilia, and obtained all the Sea coasts, and subjecting unto him Pifidia, he directed himfelfe towards Darius (who was faid to be advanced towards him with a maruailous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Province of Ala the leffe, bordering vpon the Sea, his first victorie laied under his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernement and fetling of Lycia, and Pamphilia, he fent Cleander to raife fome new Companies in Peloponnefus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas, scated on the River Ateander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Castle only holding out, which also after fortie daies was given vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygu towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a Citie called Gordium, the Regail-feate, in former times, of King Midas. In this Citie it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when hee knew not how to vndoe, hee cut it a-funder with his fword. For there was an ancient prophecie did promife to him that could vnite it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how. fo it were done, affumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the prophetic, by hewing it in pecces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the leffe towards the East, hee tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Scio, and Coos, the charge whereof he comitted vnto two of his Captaines, 12 giuing them fuch order as he thought to be most convenient for that service; and delinering vnto them fiftie talents to defray the charge; and withail out of his first spoile gotten, he sent threescore talents more to Antipater his Licutenant in Grecce, and Macedon. From Celenas he removed to Ancira, now called Anguers, standing on the fame River of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there hee multred his Armie, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves vnto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where heeleft Catus Gouernour with one

Here he vnderstood of the death of Memnon , Darius Lieutenant , which heartned him greatly to passe on towards him, for of this only Captaine hee had more re- 20 spect than of all the multitude by Davins affembled, and of all the Commanders hee had belides. For fo much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath vndertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires guided handfuls of men against multitudes of equall bodily strength, contriued victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the scarefull passions of his owne sollowers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; fuch spirits haue beene ftirred up in fundrie Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Perfons and States; to the same certaine ends, which the infinite spirit of the Vniner/all, 20 piercing, mouing, and gouerning all thinges hath ordained. Certainely the things that this King did were maruailous, and would hardly have beene undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the leffer Afia, it is like enough that he would have contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus, as this mandid. The swift course of victorie, wherewith he ranne ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may justly be imputed vnto this, That he was neuer encountred by an equal spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than Desert places, and the meere length of tedious journies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to bee ad- 40 mired for the workemanship, though therein also praise-worthie, as for the huge bulke. For certainely the things performed by xenophon, discouer as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no leffe exquifitely, though the effects were leffe materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, must looke upon such as Epaminondas, that encountring worthic Captains, and those better followed than themselues, have by their singular vertue over-topped their valiant enemies, and still prevailed over those, that would not have yeelded one foot to any other. Such as these are doe seldome line to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardie and well-ordered 50 State, than to tread downe and vtterly subdue a multitude of service Nations, compounding the bodie of a groffe vnweldie Empire. Wherefore these Paruo Potentes, men that with little haue done much vpon enemies of like abilitie, are to be regarded as choife examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to bee rather admired for the fubstance substance of their actions, than the exquisite menaging: exactnesse and greatnesse concurring fo feldome, that I can finde no instance of both in one; fauc only that braue Roman Ca/ar.

Hauing thus farre digreffed, it is now time that wee returns vnto our Easterne Conqueror; who is trauailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recour the Streights thereof before Davius thould arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he fent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Perlian Targets which he had recoursed in his first battaile; vpon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partakers of h s victorie. Herein hee well aduited him felfe; to for he that doth not aswell impart of the honour which he gameth in the Warres, -

as hee doth of the spoiles, shall never beelong followed by those of the better fort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and haue more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often fatisfie themselves with the purchase of glorie; as the weake in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and filuer.

The Gouernour of Cilicia hearing of Alexan ler comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defencible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, hee beganne over-late to prife and put in execution the Counfell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warres adulfed him to wast all the prouifions for Men and Horse, that could not bee lodged in strong places, and alwaies to 20 give ground to the Inuader, till hee found some such notal leaduantage as might affuredly promise him the obtaining of victorie. For the furie of an inuaging Armie is best broken, by delaies, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and fometimes too much, fometimes repoling themselues in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. The seand the like suddaine alterations bring many diseases upon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and fleepe, and refusing to give or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans; hee might perchance haue faued his owne life, and his estate: For it was one of the greato incouragements given by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fa-20 tall battaile, that they were to fight with all the ftrength of Perlia at once.

Xerxes when he inuaded Greece and fought abroade, in being beaten, lost only his men; but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by being beaten, loft his Kingdome; Pericles, though the Lacedemonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not bee drawne to hazard a battaile : for the invaded ought euermore to fight vpon the advantage of time and place. Because we reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, we will give fome inftances of those that have perished by adventuring in their owne Countries, to charge an inuading Armic. The Romans, by fighting with Hanibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

Pompey was well aduised for a while, when hee gaue Cafar ground, but when by the importunitie of his Captaines he adventured to fight at Phar/alia, he loft the battaile, loft the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsels which promise furetie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Conflable of France made frustrate the mightie preparation of Charles the Fift, when he inuaded Prouence, by wasting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; fodid the Duke of Alua wearie the French in Naples, and diffolue the boilterous Ar-mic of the Prince of Orenge in the low-Countries.

50 The Leigers, contrarie to the aduife of their Generall, would needes fight a battaile with the Bourgonians, inuading their Countrie, and could not be persuaded to linger the time, and stay their aduantage; but they lost eight and twentie thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois fet vpon King Edward at Cresse, and King Iohn (when the English were well neare tired out, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit haue beene wasted to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great furie, neare * Pairiers, to joyne battaile with him : But all men know what lamentable fucceile these two French Kings found. Charles the Fift of France made another kinde of Fabian-Warfare; and though the English burnt and wasted many places, yet this King held his resolution to torbeare blowes, and followed his adulfe which told him, That the English could neuer get his inheritance by smoake; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to fay of this Charles, that hee wanne from him the Duchie of Guien without euer putting on his Armour.

The fourth Booke of the first part CHAP.2. 8-3.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wife men grow short lined, and the charge of things is committed vnto fuch as either cannot fee what is for their good, 19 or know not how to put in execution any found aduife. The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason have brought the Macedonian to a great perplexitie, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne; or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia beene walted whileft Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia beene defended by Arfenes, Gouernor of that Province, with the belt of his forces: hunger would not have fuffered the enemie, to flay the triail of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that paffage; or if the place could not have beene maintained, yet might Gilicia at better leifure have beene fo throughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should have beene broken, by see- 20 king out miscries with painefull trauaile.

But Arfenes leaving a small number to defend the Streights, tooke the best of his Armie with him, to wall, and spoile the Countrie; or rather, as may seeme, to find himfelfe some worke, by pretence of which hee might honeftly runne further away from Alexander. Hee thould rather have adventured his person in cuttodie of the Streights, whereby hee might perhaps have faued the Pronince; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would have been conveighed into firong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainement within walled Cities, and himfelfe with his horfe-men have lad the leffe worke in dettroying that little which was left abroade. Handling the mat- 30 ter as he did, he gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders comming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that drfenes made all haft to joyne himfelfe with Darius, burning downe all as be went like one despairing of the desence, beganne to grow circumspect, and to thinke that surely their Generall, who gaue as loft the Countrie behinde their backs, had exposed themselues vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian (words: Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they faw that Arjenes himfelfe could well forbeare) they speedily followed the foote-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Haruest. Thus 40 Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Prouince that had been alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

of the unwarlike Armic leasted by DARIVS against ALEXANDER, The unaduised courses which DARIVS tooke in this expedition. Hee is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners. Of some thinges sollowing the battaile of Iffus.

N the meane feafon Darius approched; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred and ninetic thoufand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Justine musters them at three hundredthousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse : Plutarch at fixe hundred thousand.

The manner of his comming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to set out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his owne fafetic, perswading himselse, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and fumptuous Pagents. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priess, and after them three hundred and three score and fine yong-men, answering the num-20 ber of the daies of the yeare, couered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders cloathed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sunne: Next after these followed ten sumptuous Chariots, inlaied and garnisht with siluer and gold, and then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelue seueral Nations, which the better to avoide confusion, did hardly understand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitty to disorder all that followed them; in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of soote marched, with the Persians called immortall, because if any died the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chaines of gold, and their coates 20 with the same mettall imbrodered, whereof the sleeues were garnished with pearle, baites, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incivilitie to cut and to deface fuch glorious garments. But it was well faid: Sumptuose inductus miles, se virtute superiorem alijs non existimet, cum in prelijs oportet fortitu line animi , & non vestimentis se muniri , quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that he exceedeth those in valour, whom hee exceedeth in gav garments, for it is by men armed with fortitude of minde, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are besten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this aduice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Samnite in that fatall battaile. wherein they all sware either to prevaile or die, thirtie thousand of them having ap-40 parelled themselues in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of seathers, bad the Roman Souldiers to lay afide all feare: Non enim erifl as vulnera facere, timelas & per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no bodie, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilled finelds. To second this Court-like companie, fifteene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breede the more terrour) and these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Then came Darias himselfe, the Gentlemen of his Guarde-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the Gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Micedonians did not serve, but they served their turnes of these, by 50 changing their massie-bodies into thinne portable and currant coine. The head of this Chariot was fet with pretious stones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged-Eagle of the same mettall: The hinder part being raised high wheron Darius fate, had a covering of inestimable value, This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrew in the Macedoman bloud, for leare of marring their beautie. He had for the proper Guard of his perfont wo hundred of the bloud Royall, bloud too Royall and pretious to be full by any valorous aduentore, (I am of opinion that two hundred flurdie fellowes, like the Switzers, would have done him more feruice) and thefe were backt with thirtie thousand loot-men, after whom againe were led foure hundred spare horses for the King, which if hee had meant to have seed he would have marshalled somewhat nearer him.

Now followed the Rearcward, the same being led by Sifigambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawne inglorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-back, with fifteene Wagons of the Kings children, 10 and the wives of the Nobilitie, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines. and a world of Nurses, and Eunue's, most sumptiously apparelled, By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had beene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troupe was farre fitter to behold those sports than to bee present at battailes. Betweene these & a companie of flight-armed slaves, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treafure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Olixedonians. In this fort came this Maygame-King into the field, incombiced with a most vnnecessarie traine of Strumpets, attended with troupes of diners Nations, speaking diners languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marthalled, and for the most part so effection and forich 20 in gold and in garments, as the fame could not but have incouraged the nakeddeft Nation of the world against them. We finde it in daily experience that all discourse of magnanimitic, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and what socue cise hath beene wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, bath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoile and riches, The rich ships are boorded vpon all disaduantages, the rich Townes are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly inuaded. Our English Nations have attempted many places in the Indies, and runne upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Koyalls of plate, and Piftolets, which had they beene put to it vpon the like diladuantages in treland, or in any poore Countrie, they would have turned their Pecces and Pikes against 25 their Commanders, contesting that they had beene brought without reason to the Butcherie and flaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good fuccesse, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to thunne perill, and menthat haue well to liue, doe rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Careuilny a rien a gaigner, que descoups volontiers ilny va pas; Noman makes haft to the market, where there is nothing to be hought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his confultation with his Southfaiers, hee would have fatisfied himfelfe by the out-fides of the Perfians, and neuer haue looked into the intrailes of Beafts for fuccesse. For leaning the descrip- 40 tion of this second battaile (which is indeede no-where well described, neither for the confusion and hastic running away of the Asians could it be) we have enough by the flaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Micedonians, to informe vs what manner of relistance was made. For if it be true that threescore thouland Persian foot-men were flaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen, Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horse-men, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred and sourcscore of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut off almost the one halfe: I doe verily beloeue that this fmall number rather died with the ouer-trausile and paines- 50 taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers; they would neuer haue fold to good cheape, and at to vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings Children; had their owne honor beene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings Children; had his offate at leftle. *Darius* by this time found it true that Charlaemus a bandhed Gracin of Athens had told him, when hee made a view of his Armic about Bahylon, to wit, That the multitude which hee had affembled of diners Nations, richly attired, but poorely armed, would bee found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the countrie, whom in paffing by they would deuour, than to the Chacalonium, whom they meant to affaire; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in groffe fquadrons, which they call their Phallans, well coursed with Armour for defence, and turnilhed with weapons for offence of great and their palat, being withall ill armed and worfe difciplined, as except it would pleafe him to entertaine (hauing fo great abourdance of treafure to doe it withall) a fufficient number of the fame Gracium, and so to encounter the Macalonium with men of equall courage, hee would repent him ouer-late, as taught by the miserable facees like to follow.

CHAP.2. \.4. of the Hiflorie of the World.

But this difcourfe was fo vnpleafing to Darius (who had beene accultomed to nothing fo much as to his owne praifes, and to nothing fo little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Greens flould bee prefently flaine: who while hee was a fundring in the Tormentors hand, vled this speech to the King, That Alexan-20 der, againt whom hee had given this good counfell, should affiredly revenge his death, and lay deferued punishment vpon Darius for despiting his adusse.

It was the laying of a Wife man. Desperataeius Principis salus est, enius aures ita sormas, junt, vit assera qua vitila, nec quicquam nist incundum accipiat. That Princes sasetie x is in adesperate case, whose evers indepeal that is prostiable to be too sharpe, and will entertain enoising that is unpleasant.

Forliberise in counfell is the life and essence of counsells, Libertas consiliy est eius vita, & essenia, qua crepta consilium enanescit.

Darin did likewise value at nothing the Aduise given him by the Grasian Souldiers that Grued him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: but had they beene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men beene able to have opposed the furie of Mexander, without any affistance of the Persan footmen. For when Darias was ouerthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Grazians, under their Captaine Amphas, held firme, and marched away in order in despight of the vanquistiers. Old Souldiers are not easily distincted: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what braue retraits have beene made by them, though the rest of the Armie in which they have served, hath beene broken.

At the battaile of Raueme, where the Imperialls were beaten by the French, a 40 squadron of Spariards, old Souldiers, came oil vubroken and vundimated; whom when Gisles de Foix, Duke of Memors, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victorie not intire by their cleape, hee was ouer-turned and slainein the place. For it is truely fail of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers searce them not, That, Neglesia pericula imminent is mali opus iplum quartumis difficile aggrediantur; They goe about the business it sells, how hard season in the proposition of the standard which the missing business when there heads may bring; and as truely of those than know the warres but by heare-say. Quod valentes sant circumstants and to present the season of the sanger of the sanger

These Gracians also that made the retract, aduised Darms to retire his Armieinto the plaine of Assignosamia, to the end that Assarba being entred into those large fields and great Champions, he might have invironed the Assessams on all fides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to divide that his buge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many batrailes, and have brought no greater numbers at once then might have beene well marthalled and conducted. But this counfell was for contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Perfans, as they perfuaded Darius to inuirone the Gracians which gave the aduife, and to cut them in peeces as Traitors. The infinite wisedome of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way. but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking understanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither give nor discerne of Counsels. For Darise that would needes fight with Alexander upon a traightned prece of ground, neare vnto the Citie of Isia, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Jlexander could, (who by the aduite of Parmenio Itaied there, as in a place of best aduantage) was vtterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perfuaded him to leave in Babylon, or elfewhere) taken prifoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, lewels, and Honour, It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders prefence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Flonours preserved, and their Iewels and rich Garments reftored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifuli Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, Yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Ariflobulus the Historian, That he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Hufband lately dead, who was taken flying from 20 Damafeus by Parmenie, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who raigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, feil into captivitie; At which timealfo Darius Treasure (not lost at Is/us) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches belides.

Darius himselfe leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chiefe Captaines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow given vinto Larius, all Phanicia (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouernour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one 20 Strate was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him to fast that it troade on his heeles, for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutemant in Afia the leffe, ouerthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagenians, and others lately revolted; Ariftodemus, Darius Admirall, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly leavied; the Lecedamonians that warred against Antipater were beaten; foure thouland of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battaile, for saking both the partie of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Agypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdomes.

Alexander, to honour Ephestion, whom hee loued most, gaue him power to dif- 40 pose of the Kingdome of Zidon. A man of a most poore estate, that laboured to sustaine his life, being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people vnto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same houre.

It was a good defire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that hee could beare his prosperitie with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his aduerlitie; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not performe in himselfe that which hee commended in an other mans desire: for it was a figne that he did but accompanie, and could not governe, his felicitie.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, impor- 50 ting the ranfome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but fuch as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not youch safing, in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned returned him a more scornefull answere vpon the offer of peace, than they did before the trial of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, fo that of Darius had alreadie cast leafe, the one a resolued well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander diffained the offers of Darius, and fent him word that he not only directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Dariss himfelfe.

How ALEXANDER besieged and wanne the Citie of Tyre.

LEXANDER comming neareto the Citie of Tyre, received from them the prefent of a golden Crowne, with great flore of victualls, and other prefents, which hee tooke very thankefully, returning them answere That he defired to offer a facrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Ci-tie, from whom hee was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Herenles was feated in the old Citie adjoyning, now abandoned and defolate: To bee fhort, Alexander refolued to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the 20 Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber fufficient from Lybanus, hee filled the paffage of the Sea betweene the Hand and the Maine, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon a florme of winde, fornetime by the Tyrians fired, and fometime torne a funder, vet with the helpe of his Nauie which arrived (during the fiege) from Cyprus, he ouercame all difficulties and prevailed after he had front feuen Moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the fiege had barbaroufly drowned the meffengers fent by Alexander, perswading them to render the Citie, in respect whereof, and of the great loffe of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused 20 two thousand of those, that escaped the first furie, to be e hanged on Crosses on the Sca-shore, and referred for flaues (faith Diodore) thirteene thousand; Arrianus rec- Arrian.I. kons them at thirtie thousand. Many more had died had not the Zidonians, that ferued Alexander, conucied great numbers away by thipping vnto their owne Citie. 149.148.

Happie it was for Apollo that the Towne was taken, for one of the Tyrians having dreamt, that this God meant to for lake the Citie, they bound him fast with a golden chaine to the Idoll of Hercules; but Alexander like a gratious Prince loofened him againe.

It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nibuchodonofor had taken it before, and filled up the channell, that lay 40 betweene the Hand and the Maine.

The government of this Territorie he gave to Philotas, the Sonne of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenio; Ephession had the charge of the Fleet, and was directed to finde Alexander at Gaza towards Ægypt.

Q. VI.
How DARIUS offered conditions of peaceto ALEXANDER. ALEXANDER winnes Gaza; and deales gracioully with the Iewes.

N the meane while Darius fends againe to Alexander, fets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and laieth the losse of the last battaile to the straightnesse of the place; he hoped to terrifie him, by threatning to incompasse him in the plaine Countries, he bids him consider, how impossible it was to passe the Rivers of Euphrates,

Tigris, Araxes, and the reit, with all fuch other fearefull thinges : for, hee that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to prefent vnto another. All the Kingdomes betweene the River of Alysand the Helejiont, he offered him in I ower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offered him nothing but his owne, and that which victoric and his owne vertue had poffeit him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any; and that he having passed the Sea it selfe, disdamed to thinke of resistance in transporting himfelfe ouer Riuers. It is faid that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander hee would accept of Darius his offers, to which Alexander answered, That so would be if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and comming before Gaza, Betis a faithfull feruant to Darius, thats the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obitinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left fo many of his Macedonians buried in the fands of Gaza, that he was forfit to fend for a new fupply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first beganne to change condition, and to exercise cruel-Toleph. Ant. Liv. For after that he had entred Gaza by affault, and taken Betis, (whom Tolephus calleth Bibemeles) that was weakened with many wounds, and who neuer gaue ground to the Affailants; he bored holes through his feete, and caused him to bee 20 drawne about the streets, whilest he was as yet aliue; who being as valiant a manas himfelfe, difdained to aske him either life or remiffion of his torments. And what had hee to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that crueltie hath alwaies somewhat to couer her deformitie. From Gaza (faith Infephus) he led his Armie towards Ierufalem, a Citie, for the antiquitie and great fame thereof, well knowne vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had fent for fome supply thither, which Inddus the high Priest, being subject and fworne to Darius, had refused him. The tewes therefore fearing his reuenge, and vnable to relift, committed the care of their estates and safetie to Iaddus, who, being 30 taught by God, iffued out of the Citic couered with his Pontificall-Robes, to wit, an upper garment of purple, embrodered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests & Leuites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a maner fo vnufuall, flately, and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. 10/ephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; Howfocuer it was, I am of opinion, That he became fo confident in his enterprife, and fo affured of the fucceffe after the prophecie of Daniel had been read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or feare him. He confessed to Parmenio 40 (faith Io(ephus) That in Dio a Citic of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, hee faw in his fleepe fuch a person as Iaddus, and so apparailed, profesfing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to purfue the purposehee had in hand with affurance of victorie. This apparition, tormerly apprehended only by the light of his phantafic, he now beheld with his bodily cies; wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phanicians, (who hoped to have fackt and destroied Ierufalem) he gave the Iewes all, and more than they defired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permission to line vnder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enjoy their owne Religion.

Q. VII. 4.
ALEXANDER Winnes Agypt: and makes a tournie to the Temple of HAMMO'N.

Rom lerufalem Alexander turned againe towards Agypt, and entred

it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Affaces, received him and delivered into his hand the Citie of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this wee see that the Kings of Persia, who had more of affection than of judgement, gaue to the valiantest man hee had but the command of one Citie, and to the veriest co-10 ward the gouernement of all Egypt. When he had fet thinges in order in Egypt, he beganne to trauaile after God-head, towards lapter Hammon, fo foolish had prosperitie made him, He was to passe over the dangerous and drie fands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels-back was spent, hee could not but have perished, had not a maruailous shower of raine fallen you him, when his Armie was in extreme despaire, All men that know Agypt, and have written thereof, affirme, That it neuer raines there; but the purposes of the Almightie God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had loft his way in those vast defarts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the Armies who making fatter wing when they were followed, and fluttering flowly when the 20 Armie was cast back, guided them ouer those pathlesse fands to lupiters Temple.

Arrianus from the report of Ptolomie, the fonne of Lagus, faies, That hee was led Anian, 13, by two Dragons, both which reports may be a-like true; But many of these wonders and thinges prodigious, are fained by those that have written the Storie of 4lexander, as that an Eagle lay houring directly over his head at the battaile of 16as; That a Swallow flew about his head when hee flept, and could not be feared from him, till it had wakened him, at Halicarnaffeus, fore-shewing the treason of Eropus, practifed by Darius to have flaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians made their defensine ingines, when Aexander belieged them, there fell drops of bloud; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Otace-30 doman Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West-Indies have many such pretictales; telling how they have been affilted in battaile, by the presence of our Ladie, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselves doe hardly belocue. The strangest things that I have read of in this kind being certainely true, was, That the night before the battaile at Nouarra, all the Dogges which followed the French Armie, ranne from them to the Smitzers, leaping and fawning your them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their lines, and in the morning following, Triunlai and Tremonille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these Imperial Switzers 40 vtterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtuits, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the fouth, between whom and the territoric of Hamman, the Region Thebais, or the Superiour Agrpt, with the Mountaines of Lybia, and the River of Nilus, are interjacent, and on the North he joynes it to a Nation, called Missimones, who bordering the Sca-shore, line (faith hee) vpon the spoiles of shipwrack, whereas the Temple or Groue of this Idoll hath no Sea neare it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Mallimones be- rold Alitaba.

When Aexander came neare the place, he fent fome of his Paralites before him 50 to practife the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answere might bee given in all thinges, agreeable to his maddeambition, who affected the title of Inpiters sonne. And so hee was faluted Sonne of Jupiter by the Deuils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) defective in the Greeke tongue; For whereas he meant to fay Opaidion, he faid Opaidios, that is ; Ofonne of Iupiter, in flead of, O deare Jonne: for which Gramaticall error he was richly rewarded, and a rumor presently spread, that the great supiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perjeus and Hereules had formerly confulted with this Oracle. The one, when he was imploid against Gorgon, The other, against Anteus and Business and feeing these men had derived themselves from the Gods, why might not hee? By this it feemes, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeede he made himfelfe one, by thinking to couer from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deitie, hee had practized the Pricits to give answere to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Inpiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a boffe carried in a Boate, or by a Ramme, or a Rammes-head; I fee that many wife-men haue troubled themfelnes to finde out; but, as Arrianus speakes of Diony Sus, or Liber Pater ( who lived faith St. Augustine in Alofes time, ) Ea que de aus veteres fabulis suis conscripsere non funt nimium curiose per uestiganda; Wemust not ouer-curiously search into the fables, which the Ancients have written of their Gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospell beganne to be preached in the World, the Deuill in this and in all other Idols became speechlesse. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cafar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neare his Temple a Fountaine called Fons folis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table fets it farther off) that at mid-night is as hot as boiling water, and at Noone as cold as any yee, to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of fome other Wells of like nature, and because it is reported by Saint Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Plinie, Mela, Solinus, Arianue, Curtius, and others, and indeede our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

How ALEXANDER marching against DARIVS, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemie.

Rom the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men he heard the Philosopher Pfammones, who, believ understanding that he affected the title of Impiters Sonne, told him that God was the Eastern Vic. 2011 him that God was the Father-King of all men in generall and refining the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to fay, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that hee acknowledged none for his children faue

He gaue the charge of the feuerall Provinces of Egypt to feuerall Governours, 40 Arifl. Poll. 5. following the rule of his Master Ariffolle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Agypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner ranck and degree. He then gaucorder for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Wester-most branch of Wilus. And having now settled (as he could) the estate of Agypt, with the Kingdomes of the leffer Afia, Phanicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawnes of Darius his ill fortune, one happie victorie would readily haue redeemed.) he led his Armie towards Euphrates, which paffage though the same was committed to Mizeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without refiftance pathit. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a River for the swiftnesse 50 thereof called by the Persians The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tells vs, might Darius callly have repelled the inuading Macedonian: for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waightic stones, and those that moued not but lay in the bottome, were so round and well polished by continual rolling, rolling, that no man was able to fight on fo flipperie a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, otherwise than by joyning their handes and enterlacing their Armes together, making one waightie and entire bodie to relift the fwift pallage and furious race of the streame. Betides this notable helpe, the Channell was to deepe towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should have made head, as the foot-men were inforst to lift their Bowes and Arrowes and Darts over their heads, to keepe them from being moiltned, and made unferuiceable by the Waters. But it was truely and understandingly said of Homer.

The mindes of men are ever so affected, As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the World by the surfeit of misgouernement haue beene subject to many grieuous, and sometimes mortall diseases, So had the Empire of Perfix at this time brought, it felfe into a burning and confuming Feuer, and thereby become frantick and without vnderstanding, toreshewing 20 manifeltly the diffolution and death thereof.

But . Alexander bath now recoursed the Easterne shores of Tigris, without any other difficultie, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the paffage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with vieuen forces hee durft have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them hee forfooke the advantage which no valour of his enemies could ealily haue ouer come. But it is commonly seene, that searefull and cowardly men doe 🐒 euer follow those waies, and counsells, whereof the opportunitie is alreadic lost.

It is true that he fet all provisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might ferue 20 themselves over Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counfeli is fruitlesse when vnseasonable. For now was Alexander fo well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competencie of the Armie which he condu Fed, Those thinges also which he sought to wast, Alexander being now in fight, were by his Horse-men saued and recoursed. This, Mazeus might have done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a fireigth of horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their foote out of sight, and farre behinde.

ARIVS, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Agypt, had affembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnith, and now alfo were the Arians, Soythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (faith Curtius) that rather ferued to make vp the names of men, than to make relistance. Arianus hath numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all forts ten hundred thousand, and of horse 50 foure hundred thou fand, belides armed Chariots, and fome few Elephants. Cartius who musters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thousand foote, and neare fiftie thousand horse, comes (I thinke) nearer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vaffalls, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all forts some three or foure hundred thousand, Qqqq 3 with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Asyria to have over-bornethe sew numbers of the inuading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre. In omni pralio non tam multitudo, & wirtus indosta, quam ars & exercitium solent prafture victorium; in cuerie battaile skill and practife doe more towards the victorie, than multitude and rule audactie.

While Mexander gaue reft to his Atmic after their paffage ouer Tigris, there happened an Eclipfe of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the caule and reafon, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant, (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine prefage of their ouerthrow and deflruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly. That for the cim-10 bition of sone man, a man that distained Philip for his Father, and would necde bee called the Sonne of lapiter, they should all perish; For hee not only inforst them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountaines, and the Heauens themsslues.

Hereupon Alexander being readie to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes ofthe multitude, he called before him the Ægyptian Alfvologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might beca filtered that this defection of the Moone wa. a certaine prefage of good fuccesse; for that it was naturall they neuer imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselues, so as a forric Almanack-maker Lad beene no small soole in those daies.

Of this kinde of fuperfittious obferuation Cesar made good vse, when he sought against Ariouissus and the Germans: for they being persuaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainely loose the battaile, Cesar for them to abide it, though they durst not give it, wherein having their mindes alreadie beaten by their owner superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Armie in effect persisted.

Thele. Legypium gaue no other reason than this, That the Gracians were under the aspect of the Summe, the Persians of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glorie of being obscured. This judgement of the Legypium Priest being noised through 30 all the Armie, all were fastisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though deuised since, was well obscrued then. Exercisanteror planum Dux as pugnam non class; Let not a Captaineleaselis Armie to the sight, when it is possible with matter of terrow.

It is truely observed by Curtins, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superfiltrion; yea, we finde it in all Stories, and often in our owne, that by such inventions, deuised tales dreames and prophesies the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their owne losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neare the Persian Armic, certaine letters were furprized writ. 40 ten by Darius to the Gracians, persianding them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the aduice of Parmenia he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, oppress with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexanier seemed no lesser to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first brute surpected that some dishonourable violence had beene offered her, but being satisfied by an Eumuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortall Gods. That if they had decreed to make a new Masser of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferreit on so just and continent an enemie as Alexander, to whom he once againe before the last triall by battaile offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliner up and religne all Assate leffe, and with Agypt, all those Kingdomes betweene the Phanician Sea, and the River of Euphrates, That he would pay him for the ransome of his Mother, and his other Daughter thirtie thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leave his Sonne Occhus in hoftage : To this they fought to perfwade Alexander by fuch arguments as they had. Alexander cauting the Emballadours to be remoued, aduited with his Counfell, but heard no man speake but Parmento, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perswaded him to accept of these faire conditions. Hee told him, that the Empire betweene Euphrates and Helleffont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retayning of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of farre better vse than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable to that if he had followed his aduife, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might have lived as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himfelfe a Succeffor of able age to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward, indeed, he much inlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himfelfe; who to affure themfelus of what they had vsurped upon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeares after. The truth is, That Alexander in going fo farre into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a justand prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, aduised and gratefull: and being taught new leffons by aboundance of prosperitie, became a louer of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extreame crueltie. Yea, as Senees hath observed, the taint of one vajust 20 flaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beautie of all his greatacts and glorious victories obtained. But the Perlian Embaffadors flav his an-Iwere, which was to this effect, That what some he had bestowed on the Wife and Children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall elemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master; that thankes to an enemic was improper; that he made no warres against advertitie, but against those that resisted him. Not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great fummes of money to perfwade his friends to attempt you his person, he had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet hee could not (were it otherwise and 20 faithfull) resolue in halt to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territorie offered him, it was alreadie his owne, and if Darius could beate him back againe ouer Euphrates, which hee had alreadie past, hee would then belieue that he offered him fomewhat in his owne power: Otherwife he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the Warre, which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession, wherein, whether he were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following should determine. For conclusion, hee told them, that hee came into Alia to give, and not to receive; That the Heavens could not hold two Sunnes: and therefore if 40 Darius could bee content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, hee might perchance bee perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his day-night, to witheffe his valour, But is was the fucceffe that made good Alexanders relolution, though the counfell given by Parmenio was more found: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessario cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, consilium est noctis tempus belli fortunam tentare. Notwithflanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, he staggers & intrenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for seare of surprise had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and forborne fleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men restand store of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Milites validius religiumi, licibo potud, refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better fland to it in fight; if they 10 have their bellies full of meste and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagrely than fleele without. The numbers which Alexander had, faith Arianus, were fortic thousand foote. and feuen thousand horse; these belike were of the European Armie; for hee had belides both Syrians, Indians, Agyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He yeed but a thort speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battailes upon the River of Granick and in Cilicia, the Office donishs were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true faying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animumá, victoribus auget, & aduerfarijs aufert; One victorie begets an other, and puts courage in- 20 to those that have alreadie had the better, taking spirit away from such as have beene

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victoric inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmeno was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That zilexanders Reare-guard was broken and his carriages loft; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both fides, Fortune her felfe was long vnresolued on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliuers vs in accompt but three hundred dead Macedonians, in 30 all this terrible daies-worke; faying, That Ephellien, Perdiceas, and others of name, were wounded. Arramus findes not a third part of this number flaine; of the Perfians there fell fortie thousand (saith Curtius, ) thirtie thousand according to Arrianus: Ninetie thousand, if we beleeue Diodor. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Perfians upon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians purfued? For if of these foure or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, euery man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so called rate, as fixe or feuen hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainely, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the bankes of Euphrates, and had armed but liftie 40 or three core thou fand of this great multitude, only with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had beene impossible for Alexander to have past that River so easily, much lesse the River of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, Hee abandoned all places of aduantage, and fuffered slexander to enter so far into the bowells of his Kingdome, as all hope and possibilitie of cscape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choife, either of death or victorie; to which election Derins could no way constraine his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that inuaded them.

ARIV safter the rout of his Armic recoursed Arbela the fame night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a retrait into Aledia, perswading them that the Mucedonians greedie of spoile and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Sufa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobilitie rather obeied than approued. Alexander foone after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great malle of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred vnto him: for the teare which conducted Darius tooke nothing with it but shame and dishonour. Hee that had beene twice beaten, should rather have fent his treasure into Mexia, than brought it to Arbela, fo neare the place where he abid the comming of his enemies: if he had beene victorious he might have brought it after him at leifure, but being ouer come, hee knew it vnpoffible to drive Mules and Cammels laden with gold 20 from the pursuing Enemie, seeing himselfe, at the overthrow hee had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head to runne away with the more speede. But errours are then best discerned when most incurable. Et praterita magis reprehenda possunt quam corrigi; It is exfier to reprehend than amend what is past. From Arbela Alexander tooke his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus in whom

Darius had most considence rendred himselfe, his children and the Citie. Also the Captaine of the Caftle, who was keeper of the treafure, ffrewed the ffreetes with flowers, burnt franckinsence upon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and deliucred vnto him what focuer was committed to his truft. The Citagi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnitie to entertaine their new King: 20 after the fecame the Babylonian horfemen, infinite riche in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene these (though not greatly to be feared) and himfelfe, Alexander caused his Macedonian foote-men to march. When hee entred the Caftle hee admired the glorie thereof, and the aboundance of treasure therein found amounting to fiftie thousand talents of filter vncoyned. The Citie it selfe Thane elsewhere described with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and the Circuite, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of fourescore foote high, and on the toppe theteof (being vinder-borne with Pillars) a Groue of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is faid that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might 40 walke prinately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things but most of all in Voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Armie source and thirtic daies, Aut. Alex. confuming that time in banqueting and in all forts of effeminate exercise, which so much softened the mindes of the Macedonisms, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the feuere discipline of warre which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painefull trauaile, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Heere it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, & Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were stilled Chiliwchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Captaines which were found by certain 50 felected Judges to have deferued best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies confifted but of flue hundred. Certainely the drawing downe of the foote-bands in this latter age hath beene the cause (faith the Marshal Monluit) that the title and charge of a Captaine bath beene bestowed on every Pieque Bauf or Spurn-Cow, for when the Captaines of foote had a thousand Souldiers under

How ALEXANDER came to Perfepolis, and burnt it.

Rom Sufa Alexander leadeth his Armic toward Perfepolis, and when he fought to passe those Mountaines which sunder Susana and Per-[in, hee was foundly beaten by Ariobarganes, who defended against him those Straights, called Pyle Perfidis or Sufurdes, and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forst to saue himselfe

10 by retrait, causing his foote to march close together, and to couer themselues with their T argets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountaine-top. Yet in the end he found out an other path, which a Lycian, living in that Countrie, disconered vnto him, and came thereby fuddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforfit to fight vpon euenground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon hee fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) her returned and gaue a fecond charge vpon the Micedonians, wherein he was flaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the yeare 1515, finde a way ouer the Alpes, the Smitzers vndertaking to defend all the paffages, who, if their footmanship had not faued them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had beene ill paied for 20 their hard lodging on those Hils.

Foure thousand Greekes, faith Curtius, ( Instine numbers them but at eight hundred) having beene taken prisoners by the Persians presented themselves to alexander now in fight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Nofes, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way have beene knowne to their Countrie-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to line vpon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his falle-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approch. made him know that Fersepolis was readic to receive him, and praied him to double 30 his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoile the Kings treafure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexanders arriuall, and they that staied followed the worst counsell, for all was left to the libertie of the Souldiers, to spoile and kill at their pleasure, There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had beene laied in ballance with Perfepo'rs, would have waighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Sula, were very rich, but in Persepolis lay the bulke and maine flore of the Persians. For after the spoile that had been made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and filuer, and other jewells; there remained to Alexander him felfe one hundred and twentie thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in 40 Sula, and gage the same formall honour to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nieurides, a creature of his owne. The bodie of his Armie hee left here for thirtie daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Graterus, and with a thoufand horse and certaine troupes of chofen foote, he would needes view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitleffe and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca faics: Nonille ire. vult, fed non potest flare : He hath not a will to goe, but he is unable to fland full. It is faid and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not indure the extreame froft, and make way, but with extreme difficultie, through the fnow, that Alexander for fooke his horfe, and led them the way. But 50 what can bee more ridiculous than to bring other men into extreamitie, thereby to shew how well himselfe can indure it? His walking on foote did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime for bearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could leffe indure it. For mine owne little judgement I shall rather commend that Captaine, that makes carefull provision for those that one Engine, and after that hue hundred, as in the time of Francisthe first, the title was bonorable and the Kings were leffe charged, and farre better ferued. King Henrie the eighth of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good shippes, but to men of knowne valour, and of great chate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie commanders in one thip; but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexanaer was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antiputer fent him axe thousand foote and fine hundred horse, out of Macedon, of Thracians three thousand foote and the like number of horse, and out of Greece foure thousand foote and source hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly 10 threngthned : for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylan could hardly be brought againe, Le quitter la plume jur dermir fur la dure; To change from foft beds to bara boords.

He left the Castle and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge vnto three of his owne Captaines, deliuering withall into their handes to supply al wants a thousand talents: but to grace Mazeus who rendred the citie vnto him, he gaue him the title of his Lieutenant ouer all, and tooke with him Bigiffines that gaue up the Caftle, and having diffributed to enery Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on towards Sufa in Perlia, the same which Ptolomie, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memno- 20 nia, fytuate on the river Euleus, a Citie formetime governed by Daniel the prophet. Abulites alfo, gouernour of this famous Citie gaue it up to the Conquerer with liftie thousand talents of siluer in bullion, and twelue Elephants for the warre, with all o-Diederspeaketh ther the treasures of Darius. In this fort did those Vassalls of fortune, louers of the of more than Kings prosperitie, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their force thousand owne peace and fafetie with the Kings treasures.

While Alexander spoiled As bela, Mazeus might have furnisht his owne King from nine Millions Babylon, and while he staid foure and thirtie daies at Babylon, Abulites might have holof coined golds pen him from Sufa: and while he feafted there, Tiridates from Perfepolis might have relieued him : for the great maffe of treasure was laied vp in that Citie. But who 20 hath fought out and friended fearefull aduerlitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde not the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedie of themselues, doe in all changes of fortune only studie the confernation of their owne greatnesse.

And therefore was Alexander well admifed, that what foeuer titles he gaue to the Perfians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Sula, and Perlepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would have returned to their natural Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings are neuer to beeyfed alone in great enterprifes by those Princes that entertaine them, nor ouer to be trufted with the defences of any fron- 40 tier-Towne, or Fortrefle of waight, by the rendring whereof they may redeeme their libertie and effates loft.

Hereof the French had experience, when Don Petro de Manarra, being banished out of Spaine, was trufted with Fontarabe, in the yeare 1513.

It is faid, that Charles the fifth having promifed Charles of Bourbon the governement of Marfeilles, if he could have forfit it, and whereof he made fure accompt, told fome of his nearest Counsellers, that hee meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promife, because hee should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Mafter) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour.

The government of Sula, with the Caltle and Treasure, Alexander comitted to 50 his owne Macedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in gining them Titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to affure the place; and Darius his Mother and her children to repose themselues.

follow him, and that feckes wifely to preuent extreme necessitie, than those widesse arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of hading indured equally with the common-Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glorie and importance.

We find e wall the Warres that Gefor made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victual's was their first care. For it was a true saying of Colon Admiral of France; That who so will shape that beast (meaning Warre) must beginn. In his besite.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberalitie, of his elemencie, towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, to were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowsing cups all the reputation of his actions pall, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throncof the greatest King, into the companie and familiaritie of base Harlots, he beganne to be despited both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, whenhe was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumpruous and goodly Castle and Cirie of Persepolis, to bee consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrarie, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those thinges by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswafion to the Alians, to thinke hardly of him, and thereby aliene their hearts: For they 20 might well beleeve that hee which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing leffethan (after fuch valtation) to hold their possession. Ferevinelentiam crudelitas seguitur; Crueltie doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For so it fell out foone after, and often, in Alexander.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius

Bout this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which he e meant to have increased in Badru, had he not heard of Alexanders committing on, with whom (trusting to such companies as hee had, which was numbred at thirtie or fortie thousand) he determined once againe to trichis fortune. Hee therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazue, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the yee, and protesting that hee could neuer be beaten by any adversitie of the Kings, from the 40 faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the fame disposition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) he approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes, and Bessus, whereof the latter was Gouernour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore adulfed the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the Gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to becan enemie: this preamble Naburzanes vsed, and in conclusion adulted the election of his fellow Traitor Beffus, with promife that, the warres ended, the Empire should again be restored to Darius. The King fwollen with diffaine prest towards Naburzanes to have flaine 50 him, but Beffus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Bellius followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull feruant, perswaded him to be adusted, and serve the time, feeing scheamder was at hand, and that hee would at leaft make flew of forgetting the oilence made, which the King being of a gentle disposition willingly y, elded vnto. Belliu makes his fubmission and attends the King, who remoues his Armie, Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greeker, which had in all the former battailes served Darius with great sidelitie, and alwaies made the retreat in spight of the Aucedonians, offered himselfs to guard his person, protesting against the treason of Bellius, but it was not in his destinite to follow their advice, who from the beginning of the Warregaue him faithfull counsell, but hee inclined still to Bessian, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Captaine were corrupted by all Mexander, and prastiled the diustion of his faithfull servants. Bessian had drawned with the lowers of the world and of the Armie, promiting them all those thinges, by which the lowers of the world and themselves, are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safetie, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainely discouered the purposes of Bessus, and being ouer-come with pathon, as thinking himfelfe vnable to make head against these vngratefull and vnnaturall Traitors, he praied Artabazus his faithfull servant to depart from him, and to prouide for himselfe. In like fort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all faue a few of his Eunuchs; for his guards had voluntarily abandoned him, His Persians being most base cowards, durit not vndertake his defence 20 against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to joyne with him, who had been eable to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which for fakes him felfe, no man followes. It had been farre more manlike and King-like, to have died in the head of those fourethousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their lines, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to have lien bewailing himfelfe on the ground, and fuffering himfelfe to bee bound like a flaue by those ambitious Monsters that laied hand on him, whom neither the confideration of his former great effate, nor the honors he had given them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moueto pittie: no, nor his present aduersitie, which aboue all thinges should have 20 moued them, could pierce their viperous and vngratefull hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope it, for infidelitie bath no compaffion.

Now Darius, thus for faken, was bound and laied in a Cart, couered with hides of beafts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not beed ifcouered; and to adde defipight and derilion to his aduerfitie, they faitened him with chaines of gold, and fo drew him on among their ordinarie carriages and Carts. For Reflus and Azbazans perfuaded themfelues to redeeme their liues and the Provinces they held either by deliuering him a prifoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themfelues Kings by his flaughter, and then to defend themfelues by force of Armes, But they failed in both For it was against the nature of God, who is most judy, to pardound fof frange villanie, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenish, and an Idoleter.

Mexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Batiria, and durft not abide his comming, halted after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his soot-men beyond their powers, hee mounted on horse backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with six thousand other Horse, rather ranne than marched after Darius. Such as bated the treason of Besseur, and fectively forsooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Besseuroke, and how neare hee was at hand: for many men of worth daily ranne from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his 59 pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Besseuro mount thereon, and to save to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, persuading him to mount thereon, and to save himselse. But the vnstortunate King refussing to follow those that had betraied him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the beasts that drew him, and slew two poore servants that the safe for. This done, they (though to his great dilhonour) to receive Wabarzanes that had joyned with Beffus to murder Darius.

Of THALESTRIS Queene of the Amazons; where by way of digression it is (hewed, that (uch Amazons have beene, and are).

Ere it is faid, that Thalestris or Alinothea, a Queene of the Amazones, came to vilite him, and her fute was, (which shee callly obtayned) That shee might accompanie him till shee were made with child by him:which done (refuling to follow him into India) thee returned into her owne Countrie:

Plutareh citeth many Hiltorians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of Alexander hunfelfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may justly breede suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vaine tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lysimschus (then King of 20 Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voiage; was laught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons, as Lysimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought lingle with an Elephant, and flaine it. The King hearing fuch stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the River of Indus; faying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inferting such fables disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as wee beleeue and know that there are Elephants, though it were falle that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit vnto writers, making mention of fuch Amazons, whether it were true or falle that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. 30 Therefore I will here take leave to make digreffion, as well to flew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discouerers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabe, but many others of the feour times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any fuch kinde of people. Iulius Solinus feates them in the North parts of Alathe leffe. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one, on the River Thermodoon; the other, neare the soline. 27. et 65 Calpian Sea; Quas (faith hec) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromati- Lib.s. des. all fled that could, leaving the reit to the mercie of the Macedonian Swords. Polyfratus a Macedonian, being by purfute of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refrething himfelte with Iome water that he had discouered, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded bealts breathing for life, and not able to moue, fearched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne bloud. And by a Perlian caprine which followed this Polyfraius, he vnderstood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barbarous Tragedie. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the liuing God can bee comforted) that hee cast not out his last forrowes vnheard, but that by this Mucedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly 10 with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this Messenger, which hee befought him to pursue, not because Darius had delired it, but for his owne honor, and for the falctic of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. Heralfo, having nothing elfe to prefent, rendred thankes to Alexander for the Kingly grace vied towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, deliring the immortal! Gods to fubmit vnto him the Empire of the whole world. As hee was thus speaking, impatient death preffing out his few remaining spirits, he defired water, which Polyfiratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best thinges that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath. where-with to delire the Gods to reward his compassion.

T was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their trauells were neare an end, euery man preparing for his returne. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, hee was greatly gricued; for the bounded earth 30 fufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments hee therefore yied to draw on his Armie farther into the East, but that which had most strength was, that Bessus, a most cruell Traitor to his Master Davius, hauing at his denotion the Hyreani.:ns, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former traugiles. In conclusion, hee wanne their consents to goe on: which done, leaving Craterus with certaine Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with fixe thousand Horse in Parthenia, hee enters not without some opposition into Hyrcania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passages for a while. Hee passeth the River of Zioberis, which taking beginning in 40 Partha diffolues it felfe in the Caffian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthia and Hyrcania, where hiding it felfe under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then rifeth agains and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zendracarta, the fame Citie which Ptolomico writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region , hee rested fifteene daies, banquetting, and feasing

Phat sphernes, one of Darius his greatest Comanders, with other of his bust followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governements. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved & constant faith to his Mafter Darius. Artebias us brought with him cen thousand and fine hun- 50 dred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had served Davius : He treats with Alexander for their pardon before they were vetarrived, but in the end they render them felues simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Laced emoniums, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having flaine himselfe. Hee was also wrought, Dioson in Stealas hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (faith hee) than those which kept the bankes of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxin Sea neare (Euxalium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom hee tells vs that the Scythans call Leophin, which is as much as Firstedia, or Men-killers. And that they made incurtion into Alathe lesse, sake Ephesius, and burnt the Temple of Dina, Commethon and Auctimus report, which they performed fortic years after Troy was Emiddia.1.3. That thee came to the fuccour of Priamus.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting vpon the river of Thermodom, 10 speaking confidently of the Warres they made with divers Nations, and of their overthrow.

Plataré in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellanieus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiopa Querie of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him giuent o Theseus, though some affirme, That Theseus himselfe got her by health when shee came to viit him aboord his ship. But in substance there is little difference, all consessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompes speakes of certaine companies of the Amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom, after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and he shith farther, That these women entertaine the 20 Gele and Lelages once a yeare, Nations inhabiting betweene them and the Albanians.

Butto omitthe many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who bath written the nauigation of oreland, which he maded down the River of Amazons from Peru, in the yeare 1141. (yopon which River, for the Calculation of the failed ore: turnings, he is failed to have failed like thousand miles) reports from the relation of the failed ore: turnings, the Councell of the makes. That the both saw the East-makes and fought with them, where they fought to impeach his passage towards the East-makes.

It is also reported by Plricus Schmidel, that in the yeare 1542. where he failed up 30 the Rivers of Paragna and Parabol, that he came to a King of that Countrie, called Scherues, inhabiting under the Tropick of Captreerne, who gave his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of filter, which hee had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Mazam in those parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such A-mazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right breast, and liue a part from men, faue at one time of the yeare, when they feast and accompanie them for one moneth. These (slith he) posselise a part of the Kingdome of Manomatania Africa, nineteene degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Por- 40 tugals know.

I have produced these authorities, in part, to instific mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was delinered mee for truth by an ancient Casica, of Guiana, how von the River of Papamens (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that these women still live and governe, was held for a vaine and unprobable report.

How Alexander fell into the Persians Luxurie: and how hee further pursued Bessys.

Ow as Alexander had begunne to change his conditions after the taking of Perfepsis: 6 at this time his prosperitie had so much ouer-wrought his vertue, as he accompted elemente to bee but bus nesses, and the temperance which he had vsed all his life-time, but a poore and dejected humor, rather becomming the instructors of his youth, tnan the condition and state of so mightie a King, as the world could not equall. For he perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the Gods; hee was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him; hee ware the Robes, and garments of the Perstans, and commanded that his Nobilitie should doe the like; hee entertained in his Court, and Campe, the same shamelesse rabble of Curtifans, and Sodomitical Eunnels, that Darius had done, and imitated in all thinges the proude, voluptuous, and deterted manners of the Persians, whom he had vanquithed. So licentious is felicitie, as not with flanding that he was fully perswaded, that the Gods, whom he scrued (detesting the vices of the in-20 uaded) affifted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe contrarie to the religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soener it were, could not be but fearefull vnto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foule and fearefull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannie he vaunted to haue deliuered fo many Nations. Yea those that were dearest and nearest vnto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornefull discourse, That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers; That by his example the Macedonians were in the end of fo many trauailes more impouerished in their vertues, than inriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the conquered were the baser

20 slaues. Neither were these opinions so reserved, but that the noise of them came to his earcs. He therefore with great gifts fought to pacific the better fort, and those of whose judgements he was most jealous; and making it knowne to the Armie that Befins had assumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that hee had compounded a great Armie of the Buctrians, and other Nations, hee had arguments enough to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all alreadie gotten, might not with themselues (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were pettered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much valike the warfare of the French) having commanded euery mans fardells to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne, 40 caused all to bee consumed with fire. Certainely, this could not but have proved most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these thinges, which they had bought with their painefull trauailes, and with their bloud; than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happie temeritie ouer-come all thinges. As he was in his way, newes came to him that Satribarzanes, whom he had established in his former gouernement ouer the Arrians, was revolted, whereupon leaving the way of Bactras, he fought him out, but the Rebell hearing of his comming fled to Beffus with two thousand Horse. Hee then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire with the advantage of a ftrong winde, wonne a paffage ouer a high and vnacceffable Rock, which was de-

50 fended againft him with thirteene thousand foote. For the extremitie of the filme and fmoke forced them from the place, otherwise inuincible. I saw in the third ciuill Warre of France certaine caues in Languedee, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at lalt by certaine bundells of strawler downe by an yron chaine, and a waightie flone in the middeft, those that defended it were for fmothered, as they rendred themseliuse with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also, some three yeares before my arriuall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniands well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horfes, by the Countrie people, who did fet the long drie-grafte on fire to the east. When the countrie people, who did fet the long drie-grafte on fire to the east ward of them, (the winder in those parts being alwaise last) so as not with thair flying from the smoke, there was not any one that escaped. Stolin Borrana also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margaria, in the treel-males, by hauing the grafte fired behinde him, but the smoke being time-fully discovered, hee recovered the Sea-there with the losse of intenence of his to men. I remember these thinges, but to giue caution to those that shall in times to come inuade any part of those Countries, that they alwaics, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the grafte and sedge to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemie than a handfull of straw set on fire, die the death of honnie Bees, burnt out of the Hiue.

into Aria, to the Eath of Bactria, where the chiefe Citic of that Prouince, called Artasoans, was a while defended againft him, by the re uolt of Sartibarzanes, but in the end hee received the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new fupply of fine shoufand and fine hundred foote, and neare fine hundred Horfe, out of Greed, The flate, and other places. His journie out of Persia into the Eparts is very confused, described. For having (as all his Hiltorians tell vs) a determination to finde Besha in Bustria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyramia; from thence 30 hee wanders Northward towards the obscure Mardi, you the Colpian-Sea, and thence over the Mountaines Corona into Mia, and Dramenna.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philatas the fonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Domnus, having (I know not vpon what ground) confpired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a yong-man whom he loued, into the fame treason. The youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard to foule a matter vttered, beganne to protest against it to vehemently, that his friend was like to have flaine him for fecuritie of his owne life. So constrained by feare, hee made thew as if hee had beene wonne by perfuation, and by feeming at 40 length to like well of the bulinesse, hee was told more at large what they were, that had vndertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke; whose names Dinnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned up to Nicomachus. Nicomachus had no fooner freed himselfe from the companie of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspition) should goe to the Court and otter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole bufinefie; defiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which hee promifed to doe, but did not. Two daies paffed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter; but still excused himselfe to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leifure. This 53 his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselfe to another, one Metron, keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betweene Coballinus and Philotas, did fully perfuade himfelfe that this concealement of the trea-fon argued his hand to have beene in the bulinesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this : Wherein haue I to oftended thee that thou shouldest thinke PHILOTAS more worthie to be King than 1? Dimnus perceiuing, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded him felfe that hee lived no longer than to give his last groane in the Kings prefence. Then was Philotos called, and charged with the fulpition which his filence might justly breede. His answere was, That when the practife was reuealed vnto him by Aucomachus, he judging it to be but friuolous, did forbeare to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might have better information. This errour of his, (if to it were only an errour) although Alexander, for the notorious feruices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Aicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and given him his hand for affurance; yet by the infligation of Craterus, hee againe (wallowed his Princely promife, and made his enemies his Judges: Curtius gives a note of Craterus in this butinesse; How hee perswaded himselfe, that he could never finde a better occasion to oppresse his private enemie, than by pretending pietie and dutie towards the King. Hercof a Poet of our owne hath given a note as much better as it is more generall in his Philotas.

See how the great men cloathetheir private hate, In thele faire colours of the publike good, And to effect their ends, pretend the State, As if the State by their affection flood, And arm'd with power and Princes jealoufies, Will purthe leaft conceit of different Into the greatest ranke of treatheries, That no one action shall feeme innocent; Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made As acceliaties write ends wijust: And cuent he feruice of the State must lade. The needfull'st undertaking with distrust, So that base vilencife; idle Luxuric, Seeme faite tare, than to doe worthly, &c.

Now although it were so that the King, following the aduise of Craterus, had refoliaed the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the fame night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotai was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him beganne to binde him; he cried out vpon the King in these wordes : O A LEXANDER, the malice of mine 40 Enemies hath fur mounted thy mercie, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were viged against him by Alexander himselfe; (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) and this was not the least (not the least offence, indeede, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that facred Fellowship of the Gods, and yet hee could not but withall grieue for those that should line under such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (faith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that hee held my glorie in despight. See what a strange Monster 50 flatterie is, that can perfivade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those thinges in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude to heare the Kings Oration against him he was brought forth in vilde garments, and bound like a Theefe; where hee heard himfelfe, and his abfent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers

Heer or and Attentor having beene lost in the present Warre. Hee was so greatly oppress with griefe as for a while he could viter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits as hee sunke under those that led him. In the end the King asked him in what language be would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him, which hee did to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the alterniby that hee diddained the language of his owne Countrie, and so with-drawing himselfs, left him to his mercilese enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, Iccing the King who had so sharply invaied against him, would not vouchsafe to hearthis excuse. For, 10 not his enemies only were imboldened thereby against him, but all the rest having discourred the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselves which of them should exceede in hatred towards him; Among many other areuments which he vied in his owne defence, this was not the weakest, That when Nicomachus delired to know of Liminus what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnwilling to aduenture himselfe with meane and base Companions) Dimnus named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Aicanor, Amyntas, and fome others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the partie, and have incouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas faid well for himfelfe, it is likely that Dinnus, 20 thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though hee had neuer dealt with him in any fuch practife. And for more certaine proofe that he knew nothing of their intents, that practifed against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforst by torments or otherwise, that could accuse him, and it is true, that aduer litie being seldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as shee rather defires to draw others (not alwaies deferring it) into the fame danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoener it were, to anoide the extremitie of relistlesse and unnaturall torments, deuifed by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephelicon, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would have slaine him 28 forthwith. But he failed euen in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laied on flesh and bloud, he was forst to deliver, not what he knew, but what soeuer best pleased their eares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Auz.de Ciuit. Des.L19.c.6. Of this kinde of judiciall proceeding St. Anguisine greatly complaineth as a matter to be bewailed, faith hee, with Fountaines of teares. Divideum in suc easily assistance of the configuration of th

It had been enough for Alexanders fafetie if Philotes had been put to death without torment, the reld would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly fuspected. But Hemolus, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kingsermeltie and delight in bloud the greatest motive of his owne ill intent. Therefore, Semultim tan must amount ander, faith thus: Crudelites minite humanum milum off; midgmunt am muit ammos forms flarather self graguing gauser of variations, of abstellobemine in slungline animal transfers, Cruelite is not a humane vice; it is envoyed the off omila a spirit. It is can abeafully rage to delight in bloud and wounds, audesting away the nature of man to become a lauge Anoller.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philatas made were to giue end to the torments which hee could not any longer indure, or that the same was true indeede; For (saith he) in this case, they that speake truely, or they that denie falsily, come to one and the same end. Now while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lyncelles, Jonnein-Law to Antipater, who had beene three yeares in prison, should bee flaine: The fame dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings favour as by louing those whom the King fauoured; they were dismist. But Parmento was yet lining; Parmenio, who had ferued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Miceson the Kings Father, as himfelfe; Parmenio that first opened the way into Asia; That had depreil Attalus the Kings enemie; that had alwaies, and in all hazards, the leading of to the Kings Vant-guard, that was no leffe prudent in counfell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of Warre, and, to say the truth, hee that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the glorie and fame he had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlikely that he would have dilhonoured his fidel: tie in his eldest age, having now lived threescore and ten yeares) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flatterie had possess themselves of his affection; it was resolved that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was imploied in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trufted most, and loued best, who (to be short) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other Murderers with him, flew him walking in his 20 Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus PARMENIONIS fuit, Lib.7. militie domiq, clari viri; Multa fine Rege prospere, Rex sine illonibil magnerei gesserat; This was the end of PARMENIO (faith CVRTIVS) who had performed many notable thinges without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing worthie of praile.

XVIII.

How Alexan der fubdued the Bistrians, Sogdians, and other people, How Bessys was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

Hen these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and Brought vnder his obedience the Arassians of Energitans, he made Armonides (Sometime Davin his Secretarie) their Gouernour; then he fibdued the Arashasan, and less Arnon to command over them.

Heere the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, confifting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greekes, with whom he past through some colde regions with difficultie enough. At length hee came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citie which he honoured with his owne 40 name, and peopled it with feuen thousand of his olde Micedons, worne with age and with trauailes of the warre, The Arians, who fince he left them were revolted, hee subdued againe by the industrie and valour of Caranus and Erigius; And now herefolues to find out the new King Beffus in Bactria. Beffus, hearing of his comming, prepares to passe ouer the great River of Oxus which divides Ballria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouernour of Baffria abandoned by Bessus; The Micedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, infomuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately then Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be ; For (as Clytus did after object vnto him) he fought against weomen, not against men, and not a-30 gainst their persons but their shadowes. He found on the bankes of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materialls, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forst to sow together the Hides that couered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe ouer his Armie; which Bessus might easily haue diffrest, if he had dared but to beholde the Macedonian Armie a-tarre-ori. He had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the bankes of Tzer's, and other palliages, and yet now, when this traiterous flaue had thyled himfelie a King, her durft not perfourme any thing worthie of aflaue. And therefore those that were neerest into him, and whom he most trusted, to wit Sprimines, Datyphones, Causaes, and others the Commaunders of his Armic, moued both by the care of their owne safetie, and by the memorie of Bessius his Treaton and crueltie against Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his neck like a mastific Doege, and So was dranged along to be presented to his enemie.

In the meane while Assauler was arrived at a certaine Towne inhabited with 10 Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Assas, when long before heersturned out of Greece, who hole filtues had well-neere forgotten their Countrie-language. These moit cruelly (after they had received him with great boy) he put to the sworde, and defroyed their Citie. At this place he received Bessian, had, having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that delivered him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darus his brother, to be tormented.

But while he now thought himfelte fecure, some twentie thousand Mountainers affaited his Camp; in repelling whom he received a shor in the leg, the arrow-head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-Lytter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foote.

Sooneafter he came vnto Marsanda, which Petrus Peronsinus takes to be Samarchand, the regall Citic of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compaffe threefcore and ten furlongs (Curtins faith.) Heere hee received the Embassadors of the Sozilians (called Ausses) who offered to serve him.

The Baltrians are shortly againe with the Sogdams stirred to Rebellion by the fame Spitamens and Citans who had lately delinered into his hands the Trattor Ressure and Citans were refolicedly defended against him, all which, after vistorie, hee defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these hee received ablow on the neck which strucke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many daies after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recoursed Maraesnde, against whom 30 he imployed Maraesnus with three thousand toote and eight hundredhorfe.

In the heate of the feturnults *Alexander* marched (on if we may beleeue Curtius and others) jull be came to the River of Tunas; yoon whole banke he built another Alexander's threefcore furlongs in compalle, which he beautified with house within feventeen daies after the walls built. The building of this Citie is faid to have bin occasion of a war between him and the *Aepthans; the *Septhan* King perfivating him felle, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him under. I doe not well understand, why the *Septhan*, offering warre in such terrible manner that *Aexander* was indeed by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit ficknesses in make fait for peace; neither finde the reason why *Alexander* 42 (not intending the conquest of those Northerne deserts, but only the deserts of some banke) should result to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a vistoric described; in pursuit of which the *Macedons* ranne beyond the boundes and monuments of *Buchus* hexpedition.

The truth is, That Curtim and Trogus have greatly mislaken this River which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Invaries, that runnes between Sogdians and Seythin, which Alexander past over, while Menclemus was implied in the recovery of Samurchard. But Tanais which divides Ask from Europe is necretwo thoused miles distant from any part of Battrian Sogdians, and the way deserved who knowne. So that Alexander had (besides Invaries) the great River of Folgs and manic others to swimme over, ere hee could recover Tanais; which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imploited all the time that he lived in Asia in that travaile.

Where-

Wherefore it is enough to beleeue, that the Assatique Scythians, making some ofter to diturbe the erection of this new Citie, which was like to give some hudrance to their exertions, were driven away by the Macedonium; and being naked of defensitue Armes, easily chased some tenue or tweine miles; which is the substance of Cartus: his report. As for the limits of Buchus his iournie; like enough it is that Bachus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, a safter his death he was held a drunken God) went not verie saire into that wait Countrie, where hee could finde nothing but trees and slones, nor other busines than to set ye a monument.

Threefcore of the Macedons are faul to haue beene flaine, and one thousand one to bundend hurt in this flight, which might eatily be, in pathing a great Riuer, deriended against them by good Archers, Of seythin horfes one thousand eighthundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible, to set downe the numbers of such as pertil in battell: yet Cashr commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hash beene so inquisitione into the greatnesse of their owne successe; that writers have beeneable to deliner such particulars by credible reporte. Thold it not unlawfull to set downe what we finde; especially when it serues to give light to the builtnesse in hand. The small number which the Castecdonian solt; the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not visuall in Custius, who forbeares nothing that may so set out the greatnesse of Accander) and the little bootie that was gotten; doe make irprobable, that this warre was no better than the repulsion of a few rousing Trians (the like being yearely performed by the Mosemies, without any boatt) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was affuring himfelfe of those Septhian bordering upon Jaxartes, herecoined the ill newes that Menedemus was flaine by Spiinmenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers flaine, to wir, two thousand foote and three hundred horse. Hetherefore, to appeale the rebellion and to take reuenge of Spiannenes, makes all the hast be can 3-but Spiinmenes flies into Battisia. Alexander 30 kills, burnes, and laies wast all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Governour in that Province.

To repaire this loffe he received a great fupply of nineteene thou find Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Armie, hee recurnes towards the South, and paffeth the River of Oxus; on the South-lide whereof bee built fixe Townes neare each other for mutuall fuccour. But hee finds a new flartvp.Rebell, called frimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirtie thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong peece of ground on the top of a high Hill woom when Alexander had fought in vaine to winne by faire words, hee made choise of three hundred yong-men, and promifed ten calents to the first, nine forthe fecond, 40 and fo in proportion to the reft, that could finde a way to cheepe vp to the top thereof. This they performed with the loffe of some two and thirtie of their men, and then made a figue to Alexander, that they had performed his communidement. Hereupon he fent one Cophesto perswade Arimazesto yeeld the place; who, being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Mucedon was alreadic mounted vp, yeolded simply to Alexanders mercie, and was (with all his kindred) scourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well described for neglecting to keepe about watch in lo dangerous a time. For the place, as feemes by the description, in the historially haue beene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength carnot doe; Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected a Of which 50 I will give you an example in a place of our owne.

The lland of Sarke, joyning to Garnfer and of that gone incent, was in Queene Amies time surprised by the French, and could never hand beene recovered against by strong hand, having cattle and corne enough your the place to lead to many men as will serve to defend it, and being every way so inaccossible that it might be a half held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industrie of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this fort regained. Hee anchored in the roade with one ship of small burden, and, pretending the death of his Marchant, befought the French, being some thirtie in number, that they might burie their Marchant in hallowed ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such commodities as they had aboord; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not so much as with a knife) the French-men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their boat, not filled with a dead carkaffe, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French received them at their landing; and fearching enery of them so narrowly as they could not hide a pen-knife, gaue them leave to draw their Coffin vp the Rocks with great difficultie; some part of the French tooke the Flemish boat and rowed aboord their ship, to fetch the commodities promifed, and what elfe they pleased, but being entred they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the dore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin set vpponthe French; they runne to the Cliffe and crie to their companie abourd the Fleming to come to their fuccour, but finding the boat charged with Flemings yeelded themselues and the place. Thus a Foxe-taile doth sometimes helpe well to peece out the Lions-skinne, that else would be too short.

How ALEXANDER flew his owne friends.

Fter these Sogdian and Soythian Warres, wee reade of Alexanders kil-Fter the le Sogdian and Seythian Warres, wee reade of Alexanders kil-ling of a Lion, and other frivolous matter, and that he committed the gouernement of Maracanda, and the Countrie about it, to Clytus, and how he flew him sooneaster, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the sonne, or rather because hee objected to the King the death of Parmenio, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein he 30 toucht him to the quick, the same being deliuered in publike and at a drunken banquet. Clytus, indeede, had deserved as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular faued his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolencie was intolerable. As he in his cups forgat whom hee offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgat whom he went about to slay, for the griefe whereof he tare his owne face and forrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswalions of Califthenes, it is thought he would have slaine himselfe.

Wine begat furie, furie matter of repentance : but præceding mischieses are not amended by fucceeding bewailings. Omne vitiumebriet.is & incendit, & detegit, ob 40 stantem malis conatibus verecundiam remouet; vbi posedit animum nimia vis vini, quiequid mali latebat, emergit: non facit ebriet as vitia, sed protrabit; Drunkennesse both kindles and laies open enery vice; it remoues out of the way that shame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastrie, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out : drunkenneffe indeederather discouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who flew Besius, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized vpon his fellow-conspirator Dalaphernes, and delinered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he past over, and went on with his Armic into Ga- 50 baza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he oft in one Tempest a thousand of his traine. From hence hee inuaded the Sacans, and destroied their Countrie. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortanes who submitted himselfe vnto him, feasted him greatly, and presented him with thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians dildained, yet none of them durft vie any freedome of speech after Clytus his death. From hence hee directed his course towards India, having to increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twentie thouland armed men.

In the meane while hee would needes bee honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Micedonians, hee imploied two pernitious Paralites, Hagis and Cles; whom Califthenes opposed: For, among many other honest arguments vsed to the affembly, he told Cleo, That he thought that dlexander would diffaine the gift to of God-head from his Vaffalls; That the opinion of Sanctitie, though it did sometime follow the death of those who in their life-time had done the greatest thinges, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet liuing in the World. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a carowling feait) but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the Gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie to bee reuenged on Califthenes, who being a man of free speech, honeit, learned, and a louer of the Kingshonour, was yet foone after tormented to death, not for that hee had be-20 traied the King to others, but because hee neuer would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the King made by one Hermolass and others (which they confest) he caused Callasthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torne a funder vpon the rack: This deede, vnworthic of a King, Senecathus censureth. Hoc est ALEXANDRI crimen aternum, quo à nulla virtus, nulla bellorum fælicit às redimet. Nam quotiens quis dixerit, Occidit Perfarum multamillia: opponitur, & CALLISTHENEM: Quotiens dictum erit. Occidit DARIVM: opponitur, & CALLISTHENEM. Quotiens dictumerit Omnia Oceano ten:15 vicit, ipfum quoque tentauit nouis classibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thracia v fg ad Orientis terminos protulit : dicetur, fed CALLISTHENEM occidit. Omnis licet an-30 tiqua Ducum Regumá, exempla transferit, ex his que fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus CALLISTHENES; This is the eternall crime of ALEXANDER, which no vertuenor felicitic of his in Warre shall ever be able to redeeme. For as often as any man shall (2), He flow many thousand Persians; it shall be replied. He did so, and be flew CALLI-STHENES: When it Shallbe faid, He flew DARIVS, it Shallbe replied, and CALLISTHE-NES; When it shall be said, he wanne all as farre as to the very Ocean, thereon also he adnentured with unufuall Nauies; and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the vtmost bounds of the Orient, It shall be said with all; But he killed CALLISTHENES. Let him haucout-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts makes fo much to his glorie, as CALLISTHENES to his reproach.

of ALEXANDERS journie into India. The battaile betweene him

Ith the Armie before remembred, of one hundred and twentie thouand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where fuch of the Princes, as fubmitted themselves vnto him, he entertayned louingly, the rest hee constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they relifted. Hee then came before Nife built by Bacalso, which after a few daies was rendred vnto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Becchus, to whom hee made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dedala, and thence to Acadera, SILL Countries

Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victualls raining, he divides his Armie: Provime led one part, Cenon an other, and himselfe the rest. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yeelded vnto him by Cleophe the Queene, to whom againe he restored it; at the siege of this Citic heregeined a wound in the legge. After this, 2 ora was taken by Foly/perchon, and a Rock of great itrength by himfelfe: he wannealfo a pallage vpon one Eryx, who was flaine by his companic, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as hee arrived at the River of Indus. Comming to Indus hee found there Ephestion, who (being fent before) had 10 prepared boates for the transportation of his Armie, and ere Alexanders arrivall, had perswaded omphis King of that part of the Countrie to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphu presented himselfe with all the strength of his Countrie, and sixe and sittle Elephants, vnto him; offering him his feruice and affiltance. Hee made Alexander know that hee was an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abialares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this disvision to make his owne victorie by farre the more casie. Hee presented Alexander with a Crowne of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and with all four escoretalents of filuer coine, which Alexander not only refuled, but to flow that he was co- 20 uctous of glorie, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thouland talents of his owne treasure. befides other Persian rarities. Abiasares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemie omphis into his protection, refolued to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his owne firength did but equall that of omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, hee thought it an ill match when Alexander, who had alreadie beaten under foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfe a Partie and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porsu hee received this maniy answere; That hee 30 would fatisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was refolued to take counfell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolues to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaffes, and to find Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troupe of Horse. If Pariss had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had furely staid somewhat longer ere he had seene india. The River was foure furlong broade, which makes halfe a mile, and withall deepe and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well thad owed with wood, and of good capacitie. Alexander fent Ptolomie vp the River with a great part of the Ar- 40 mie, fhrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolomie, supposing that the whole Armie of Auedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without relistance. He orders his troups and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather believes that Abi fares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had been come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had pastit. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vie; for there had fallen fo much raine, and thereby the fields were 50 fo moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vantguard, who fo galled thefe Indians as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the wagons & those in them. Perdiceas also gaue vpon the Indian horse-men, and the one & the other were forft to recoile. Ports moues forward with groffe of his

Armie, that those of his Vantguard scattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being tollowed with Epheflion, Ptolomie, and Perdicens, tooke on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus , hee directed to breake upon Porus his battaile of foote, firengthned with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried vpon one of them of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Alscedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long and strong Pikes of the Macedons, so galled them, as being inraged, they turned head and ranne over the foote that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the aduanto tage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulneffe of the Macedonian Captaines, the victorie fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number : for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his owne Confederate and Countrie people. Yet for his owne person he neuer gaue ground otherwise than with his fword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Armie, he became a prifoner to the Conaucror, from whom againe he received his estate with a great enlargement.

How A LEXANDER finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

Forbeare to trouble my selfe and others with a friuolous discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their trauailes : or of those pettie Wars which Alexander made these their trauaises: or of those pettie wars which zuexanaer made betweene the ouerthrow of Parus, and his failing downethe River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by meanes of our late Nauigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of 30 those Kings we could in no fort be perswaded to beleeue, till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger thinges in the World, than are to bee feene betweene London and Stanes.

Our great traueller Mandeule who died in the yeare 1372, and had feene fo much of the World, and of the East India, we accompted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had be an other reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friers Guillimms in Liege, where the religious of that place keepe fome thinges of his, Comme pour ho- Guie, in Dife. norable memoire de son Excellence; For an honorable memorie of his Excellencie, saith of the low

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradris, Acesimes, and the relt, fall into the maine streame, are now possest by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlane, who commands all that tract betweene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a thip of London, suffered shipwrack in the yeare 1609, and some of the companie trauailed ouer Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Diony Jopolis.

Phylostratus in the life of Apollonius Traneus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs that those two great Captaines (whom Alex-30 ander fought by all meanes to out-fame) when they indepored to subject vnto them the Oxydrace, a people inhabiting betweene the Rivers of Hyphalis and Ganges, they were beaten from the affault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainely knowne, that the great Kings of the vttermost East, haue had the yfe of the Cannon, many hundreds of yeares fince, and even fince their first civilitie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexanders time. But Alexander pierst not fo farreinto the East. It sufficed, that having alreadie over-wearied his Armie hee discovered the rett of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations beyond the River of Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions : and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twentie thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Aiexan ier were more inflamed than ever to proceede in this discouerie and conquett, yet all the arthe had could not perfivade the Souldiers to wan- 19 der ouer those great desarts beyond India and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswassue Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discouer such part of the Ocean Sca, as was nearer at hand, whereunto the River of indus was their infallible guide. Alexander feeing that it would bee no otherwise, deuised a prettie trick, where-with hee hoped to beguile potteritie, and make himfelfe feeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for the Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher mangers than his Horses could teede in. He caused all furniture of Men and Horses to bee made larger than would ferue for vse; and scattered these Armours and Bridles about his Campe, to 20 bekept as reliques, and wondered at by the fauages. Proportionable to the se heraifed vp twelue great Altars to be the monument of his journies end. This was a readie way to encre the the fame of his bigneffe; to his greatneffe it could adde nothing faue a suspition that it was lessethan is thought, seeing he strone so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned agains to the banke of Acosines, and there determined to fet vp his fleet where Aces and Hydaspis incounter, where to testifie by a surer monument, how farre he had past towards the East, he built by those Rivers two Cities: the one hee called Nicea, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here agains her received a fourth supply of fixe thousand Three 20 cian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylen live and twentiethousand Armours, garnished with filuer and gold, which bee distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wanne many Townes, and committed great flaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he lept from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Benis of Sonthampton, friuolous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the River with his fleet, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Baétria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embaffadours from a King of India, who submitted himselfe vnto him. He feafted these Embassadours vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all 49 the sumptuositie that could be deuised, who soone after their dispatch returned againe with a prefent of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirtie Wagons, and to each foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other thinges rare and rich.

Their entertainements ended, he failes towards the South, paffeth through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he tooke in this paffage, Samus was one, the Inhabitans whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomie (afterward King of Agree) was wounded, and cured by an hearbe which Alexander dreamt that he had feene in the 50 mouth of a Serpent,

When he came neare the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a fuddaine shuffled one upon an other by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the fandie bankes of the Ri-

ner, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed, but after hee had a few daies observed well the course of the Sea, he patt out of the rivers mouth some few miles. and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune returned : and the better to informe himfiftes hee fent Neurobus and Oneffectus, to discouer the coast towards the mouth of Europeates: Arrianus in the beginning of his fixt Booke hath written this paffage downe the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Veffells, in which hee transported his Armie, the Commanders that were yied therein, and other the maruailous prouisions made.

Nearethe out-lets of this River hee spent some part of the Winter, and in eighto teene daies march from thence recourred Gedrolia, in which paffage his Armie fuffered such miserie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twentie thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, which hee carried into India, not the fourth part returned aliue.

Of ALEXANDERS Riot, Crueltie, and death.

Rom Gedrafia Alexander led his Armic into Carmania, and so drawing neare to Persia, hee gaue himselfe wholly to seasting and drinking, imitating the trium phs of Bacebua. And though this Swinish vice bee hatefullenough in it selfe, yet it alwaise instanded this king to Crueltie. For said the must be strong must followed the feest, for ASPASTES one of his Provincial Governours he commanded to be flaine, fo as neither did the exceffe of voluptuou, nelle qualific his crueltie, nor his crueltie hinder in ought his voluptuoulnelle.

While he refreshed his Armic in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foote and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellowes, that had been imploied in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was 30 made, by the Deputies of the Provinces in which they had commanded; and their offences were fo outragious, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of Incia, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembring the vertue of him whom they had flaughtered. The end was, That Cleander and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Soundiers by them imploied, were delivered over to the Hang-man: every one rejoycing that the Ire of the King was at laft executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Acarehia and Oneffectus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Iland rich in gold, and of other strange thinges; whereupon they were commanded to make form. farther disconcrie : which done, that they should enter the 40 mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neare to Babylon he vitited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Palargada, now Arrianus hath called Chelquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orlines, one of the Princes of Perfis, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagons, an Eunuch in especial fa- crus lombe. nour with the King, was neglected, he not only practifed certaine loofe fellowes to witnesse against Orines, that he had robbed Cyrus Tomb, for which he was condemned to die, but hee affifted the Hang-man with his owne handes in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradates to be flaine, suspecting his greatnesse. Capera! (laith Cva Tivs) effe praceps ad reprafentanda supplicia, item ad deteriora creamin : He beganne bead-longly to fleed bloud, and to believe falle reports. It is true, that 50 he tooke a way to make all men wearie of his gouernement, feeing crueltie is more fearefull than all the adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is faid that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when hee had hard threefcore and thirteene yeares. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrie, being an Indian, Or fought to preuent the griefe and incommoditie of cider age, it is vincertaine: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-feeing and forethewing Alexanders death, he promited to meete him thortly after at Babylon.

From Pajargada hee came to Suja, where hee married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giving her yonger fifter to his beloued Ephestion, and fourescore other Perfan Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests inuited to the fealt, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thoufand yong fouldiers out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon having lavishly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with fine thousand talents, and fixe thousand hired Souldiers, but he was rejected in Greece, and there flaine. Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelitie of the Greekes, whom Harpalus with thele forces and treasures could not fin re-yet bee fent commandement that they should againe receive their banished men, whereunto (fearcfull of his indignation) all submitted themselves, (except the Athenians jthough they refolued that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a maruailous disconcentment in his Armie, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no ion, crindure the travell of Warre, and to keepe the reft in A/a. He vied many Orations to fatisfic them, but it was in vaine during the tempest of their fune. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine threed, when they have tumbled a while, to are the viconfiderate multitude easily conducted when 20 their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Lieutenantship of Mace. on, The false, and I hace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeker in his absence, discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fidelitie, and fent him to many strong supplies into Afa from time to time. Certainely, if Alexander had not taken counfell of his cups, hee would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a thronger reason for his remove, than to have imploied him in the conduction of a new furply to be brought him to Babylon, the warre being now at an end. For Antipater faw nothing withis remove, but the Kings disposition to fend him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this Antipater, 20 the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, doe not fland in doubt of every man ill-affected though valiant; but there is a kinde of Kingly courage, compounded of hardineffe and vnderstanding, which is many times so fearefull vnto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After hee had fent for Antipater, hee made a journic into Media to fettle thinges there; where Ephestian, whom he favoured most of all men, dies. The King accerding to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse; hangs his Philition; and beflowes upon his Monument twelve thousand talents: After which hee returnes to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but fent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to 40 free himselfe. For if we beleeve Curtius (whom Piutarch and others gaine-fay) Antipater by his Sonnes, Caffander, Philip, and 16 la, who waited on Alexanders cup, gauc him poison, Theffalus (who was of the conspiracie) having inuited him to a drinking feaft of purpole. For after he had taken a caroufe in Hercules his cup, a draught of -drinke (tronger than Hercules himfelfe, he quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainely the Princes of the World have feldome found good by making their ministers ouer-great, and thereby suspitious to themselves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to bee a debt, but is perfuaded that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vaffalls, will neuer pleafe himfelfe with the price given. The only reftoratine, indeed, that strengthens it, is the goodnesse and vertue of the Prince, and his 50 liberalitie makes it more diligent; fo as proportion and diffance be observed. It may be that Antipater having commanded two or three Kingdomes twelve yeares, knew not now how to play any other part; no more than Cafar did, after he had so long a time gouerned the Gaules, where he etterly forgat the art of obedience. A most cruell and vngratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius doe not belie him: For though hee feared some ill measure upon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Callithenes, having beene so lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrarie, but that the King had refolued to have given him some other great government in Afix: the old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance defired to be governed by Crateries, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

XXIII.

Of ALEXANDERS Perfon and qualities,

Owlocuer it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot bee excused, no more than his vanitie to be effected the fonne of Jupiter, with his excelline delight in drinke and drunkennesse, which others make the cause of his seuer and death. In that hee lamented his want of enterprifing, and gricued to confider what hee should doe when hee had conquered the World, Augustus Casar found just cause to deride him, as if the well governing of fo many Nations and Kingdomes, as he had alreadie conquered, could 22 for have offered him matter more than aboundant, to buffe his braines withall. That he was both learned and a louer of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sr Franeis Bacon, in his first booke of the advancement of learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His liberalitie I know not how to praife, because it exceeded proportion. It is faid, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was guen, did out of modestie refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune : to whom Alexander replied. That hee did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: of which SENECA; Animola von videtur & regia, cum fit Itultifima. L.z.deBin.c.i. Mildenim per je quemquam decet. Refert quid cui quando quare, vbi, &c. sine quibus facti rationon conflibit : babeatur per fonarum & dignitatum proportio & cum fit vbig. virtutis 2: mo.lus, eque peccat quod excedit, quam quod deficit; It seemes a braue and royall speech, whereas indeede it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it selfe beseemes a man. Wamuft regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which confiderations no act can be approued. Let honours bee proportioned unto the persons : for whereas vertue is ouer limited by measure, the excelle is as faultie as the desect.

For his Person, it is very apparant, That he was as valiant as any man, a dispositiontaken by it feife, not much to be admired; For I am refolued that hee had ten thousand in his Armie as daring as himselfe. Surely, if aduenturous natures were to be commended fimply, wee should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Thecues, Ruffians, and mastife Dogges. For certainely it is no way praise-worthie 40 but in daring good thinges, and in the performance of those lawfullenterprises, in which we are imploied for the feruice of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other Troublers of the World, who have bought their glorie with fo great destruction, and effusion of bloud, I thinke him farre inferiour to Cefar, and many other that lived after him, feeing hee never undertooke any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted, nor was euer encountred with any Armie of which he had not a most mastring advantage, both of weapons and of Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captaines by farre exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seemeth, Fortune and Destinies (if we may vse those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, 50 both heapes of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the voke, and Kingdomes that inuited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, wee will agree with Senees who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Sonne, gives this judgement of them. Quod non minores fuere peffes mortalium quam inundatio, qua pla- Natural quet. num omne perfusum est, quam conflagratio qua magna pars animantium exaruit; That 1.3.9.1.

they were no leffe plagues to mankinde, than an ouer-flow of waters, drowning all the leuell, or some burning droughth, whereby a great part of lining creatures is scorched up.

CHAP. III. The raigne of ARIDEVS.

ò. I.

Of the question about succession to ALEXANDER.

HE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared is in fuch cale, as was that monitrous Giant Polyphenne, hauing loft his only 20 eye. For, that which is reported in tables of that great Cyclopy, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance vneffeduall, and harmefull chiefly to themfelues. The causes whereof (vnder the duine ordinance) were, partly the vncertainetic of Title to fueceffion in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the fluborne pride of Mecander himfelfe, who thinking none worthie to be his Heire, did refufe to eltablish the right in any one, leauing euery one to his owne fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who ail had 39 learned of their Master to suffer no equalls; a lesson some taught into spirits reflecting woon their owne worth, when the reuerence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly berne thewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouering in Macedon as Protector, aflumed vito himfelfe the Kingdome, not rendring it vito Ampitas. (the Sonne of his elder brother Perducas) when he grew to manseflate; but only beftowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne; by which bond and much more by his proper firength he affured the Crowne vito himfelfe: Ampitas neuer attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) he did against Alexander in the beginning of his raigne. Wherefore Empited the fole iffue of his marriage, ought in realon to have been eaknowledged Queene after 40 Alexander, as hauing better Title thereto, than either He or Philip bad, when they lived, yield (peraduenture) fome Law of that Nation forbad the raigne of women.
But the excellent vertue of those two Princes had veterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and og great were their conquests, that CAleedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way deserving to be lated in ballance against the demand of their posteritie, had they left any able to make challenge of the Roiall sette.

Alexander having taken many wives had iffice by none of the principall of them.
Brifine the Daughter of Artabasia a Perfan had borne vinto him a yong Sonne; and Rosane the Daughter of Osyantes (whom he had more foleminely martied) was left yo by him great with child. But the bafeneffe of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of the Plea made for them, by fome that would (perhaps) have wrought out their owne ends, vinder the name of Mexanderschildren.

Cleopatra

Cleapatra the filter of Alexander, widdow to the King of Epirus, and Arideas his base brother (Jonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Ladie Europtic before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleapatra there was no speech, which may give sufficient, that either Law or Custome had made that sex vacapable of the Soueraignette: Arideas (betides his bastardie) was neither for person nor qualitie fit to rule as King, yet vyon him the election fell, but slowly and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsailors having ouer-laboured their disagreeing wits in deufing what was belt, were content for very wearingle to take what came next to hand.

mention of the halfe-Perfun broode, King Mexanaers children, was of opinion, that the rule of all thould be given to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them (hould be decreed: (6 tarre was hee from acknowledging anyone as true Heire to the Crowne.

This Prolomic was called the fonne of Legin, but reputed of Philip: who having vied the companie of Lagins Polomeis mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagins being great with child. Therefore, whether it were fo, that he hoped well to work his owne fortune out of those differences, which are incident vinto the confultations of many amotitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their oquiet with subjection to one, describing regard by his boud, and trust for his even carriage, or whether hee delired only to get a share to himselse, which could not have come to pisse had all beene given to one: plaine enough it is, that beethought not on preferring Articles before himselse; and therefore gaues such counsilie as stretch is owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this deutife of his tooke place in deede; though not in forme as hee had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexandres emptie chaire, as Prolomie had conceived the forme of their consistations, or to set in the chaire such as Kridense, no wifer then the chaire it sisse. Also the controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines, by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puillance.

30 But as these counterfait shewes of diffembling aspirers, doe often take check by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to goe more directly to worke: so was it like to have fared with Ptolomic and the rest, when Aristonius, an other of the Captaines; interpreted the wordes of Alexander; laying, That hee left his Kingdome to the worthieft, as deligning Perdicens, to whom (lying at the point of death) hee delinered his ring. It feemed good in reason, that Alexander should bee disposer of his owne purchases; and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plaine enough, follong as no man would interpole an other construction : every one being vncertaine how the fecret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their loue, or because they would not be of the latest, vrged Perducas to take 40 vpon him the citate Roiall. He was no stranger to the Roiall bloud; yet his birth gauchim not fuch reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom hee had beene very inward, and that especially since the death of Ephestion (a powerfull Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his owne worth hee might well bee commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had given much proofe of his prinate valour. But very furly he was: which qualitie (joyned with good fortune) carried a fliew of Majestie: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the prefent bulineffe a foolish ouer-weening did him as great harme, as it had been great happineffe to haue fucceeded "Messander. For not content to haue the 50 acclamation of the Souldiers, approxing the funtence of *misloms*, he would needs counterfait modellie; thinking that euery one of the Princes would haue intreated him to take the waightie burden of an Empire, which would bee the less enions the more folemnitie he wied in the acceptance. It is truely faid, He that faineth himselfe a sheepe may chance to be catten by a Wolfe. *Melerge*, (a man by nature en-uious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiceas) tooke advantage of his irrefolute behauiour, and very bitterly inueighed against him. In conclusion he pronounced, that who socuer was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he inuited them, who were nothing flow, to share it. This diffurbed all the Confultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without confent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Meleager.

The election of ARID & vs, with the troubles there-about arising; the first dualion of the Empire.

Vring this vp-rore, mention was made of Aridaus by fome one, and entertained with good liking of many, vntill at last it grew to the voice of the Armie. Ateleager having with drawne himfelte tumultuously from the companie of the Lords, was glad of to saire an oc-cation to make himselfe great; therefore he produced Arman, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Alip, and 20 brought him into the Palace, inuciting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles with Hood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolue what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed-man, tooke vpon him to proclaime the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiceas at first had given, appointing Perdiceas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this child was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Pythen vaine. Finally, Perdiceas with fixe hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders bodie lay: but the Armie conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he lifted, eafily brake in vpon them, and inforced them to accept Aridam for their Soueraigne Lord. 30 Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither fide faithfully meant.

Leonatus who was of the Roiall blond, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, iffued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horfe, which confifted (for the most part) of the Nobilitie. Perdicas abode in the Citie (but flanding vpon his guard) that he might be readie to take the opportunitie of any commotion, that should happen among the infantrie. The King (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leaue to haue Perdiceas made away; which attempt succeeded ill being neither fecretly carried, nor committed to fure executioners. Their comming was not vnexpected : and they were by Perdice as rebuked with fuch granitie, that they depar- 40 ted honester than they came; being sorrie of their bad enterprise. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in an vp-rore, which the King leeking to pacific wanted authoritie, as having newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selfe affoorded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said that no harme was done, for Perdiceas was aliue: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which hec imputed to Meleager; abandoning the furest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appealed, untill the King by offering to refigne his estate unto them, renued out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moved them to fet him vp at the first.

Perdices having now joyned himselfe with Leonatus kept the fields, intending to cut off all prouision of victualls from the Citie. But after sundrie Embassies pasfing betweene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to haue the Authors of sedition given vp into their handes; the King, that Meleager might bee joyned with CHAP.3. S.2. of the Historie of the World.

Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in government of the Armic) things were comnounded according to the Kings defire. Meleager should have done well to confider, that fuch men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treacheric lurked under their great facilitie. Generall peace wastenewed, and much lone protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had beene in Alexanders time : but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windie spirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Persicess, tending to his owne to diffrace, but in fuch termes as might feeme to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an injurie done to himfelfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Peráceas, that such authors of discord might beepunished. Perdices (as a louer of peace) did well approue the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be emade, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Armie. The plot was mischieuously laied: Had Meleager given way to feditious rumours, he must needes have incurred the generall hatred of all, as a fower of diffention; and thereby with publike approbation might have beene cut off, as having often offended in that kinde: his Prince being 20 too weake a Patron. Now feeking redreffe of these disorders, he hattened his owne ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne, and practifed with many ceremonies, as for cleanling of the Armie. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries, were each according to their qualitic fet in array, a-part from others, as if they had beene of fundrie forts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmith (as by way of exercife) according to direction of their feuerall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disaduantage; and the countenance of the horse and Elephants beginning to give charge vpon them, was such, as discouered no je-30 fling pallime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horsemen: of which custome Perdiceas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemies. For Aridaus was alwaies gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three daies before hee had fought the death of Ferdicass at the infligation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdicess vp and downe about the foot-men, commanding them to deliuer vnto the death all fuch as Perdice, as required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them flaine, in the presence of the King who should have defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punish-ofthem his especial friends. Having therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage; when hee faw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he sled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanétuarie: for thirher they fent and flew him. The Armie being thus corrected was led into the Citie, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Arideus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdicess his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funeralls of Alexender thought vpon; whose ment Meleager had expected: they were fuch as had followed him, when he diftur-

40 bed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some

30 bodie hauing beene seuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no ligne of poison appearing, how great socuer the suspition might bee. The charge of his buriall was committed to Arideus : one of the Captaines, who was two yeares preparing of a great and coftly show, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laied; many coarses of his friends being laied in the ground, before that of Alexander was bellowed in Alexandria, a Cittie of his owne building in Egypt.

ò. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

Hileft these thinges were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece with a Warre, which the Athenians more brauely than wifely had begunne in Alexanders life, but now did profecute more boldiy than before, vpon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be reflored vnto their former places. Hee knew the factious qualitie of the Gracian Estates, and therefore thought so to prouide, that in every Citie hee would have a fure partie. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than he wanne by this proude injunction. His pleafure indeede was fulfilled; yet not withoutgreat murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyrannie. The Athenians greatly decaied in effate, but retaining 20 more, than was needfull, of their ancient spirits, forbad the execution of this decree in their Dominions; fo did also the Atolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them tooke Armes, but feemed to bearethemselues, as men that had done no more then they might well justific by reason: neuerthelesse to preuent the worst, the Athenians gaue secret instructions to Leofthenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leavie an Armie, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leafthenes to doc : great numbers of Greeke Souldiers being lately returned from the Asian Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered up eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexan- 30 ders death: at which time the Citic of Athens declared it felfe, and more honorably than wifely, proclaimed open Warre against the Macedonians, for the libertic of Greece. Hereupon Leofthenes drew in the Etolians, and some other Liftates, gane battaile to the Baotians, who fided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arrang in all haft, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Ashato Crastical for Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, thunning or purfuing their destinies a-farre off, which deceive all mortall wisdome, even when they seeme neare at hand. One moneth was feareely paft, fince nothing to heavily burthened 40 the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Chaceden; which hee then feared as death, but now defired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conneigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to fucceede Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The fuspitions were strong that hee had a privile charge to put Antipater to death : neither did that which was commonly published found much better; which was, That Antipater should bee fent vnto the King, as Captaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to bee leavied in Europe For Alexander was much incenfed against him by his Mother Olympias : and would fometimes give out speeches testifying his owne jealousie and hatred of him ; but 50 yet he stroue to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few ef Alexan lers Lieutenants bad escaped with life : most of them indeede were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings ri-gour was fuch, as could finderebellious purpofes (for fo hee interpreted even lewd gouernement) in bate persons; little might Antipater hope for, who having sitten Viceroy ten yeares in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the prefence of fo fell a Master, and the enuic of a Court, wherein they had beene his inferiors, which would now repine to fee him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to preuention, working first the Kings death by poison, given by his Son Islaus, Alexanders cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth untill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his Sonne Callandar : great cause of much feare he had, which I note in this place as the ground

10 of effects to be produced in very few yeares.

At the present Crate us was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying neare, follicited to make haft. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raifed more than thirteene thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countrie being emptied into. Asia. The The falians indeede who had long stood firme for Philip and Alexander, who also were the best horse-men of Groece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the libertie of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in Thesalie trie the fortune of a battaile with Leosthenes; rather (as may seeme) fearing the increase 10 of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greekes, (were they not checkt at the first) than prefuming on his owne strength. For Leofthenes had of Athenians, Atolians, and Mercinaries, two and twentie thou fand foot, befides the affiftance of many pett Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse hee brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but ouer-strong he was that way also, when once the The flalians had revolted vnto him. So wontipater loft the day : and his loffe was such, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retrait into hisowne Countrie: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well prouided of all thinges necessarie to beare out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon the refusall close vp the 30 Towne with earth-workes, and a wall. There will wee leave him for a while, trauailing in the last honourable enterprise that euer was under-taken by that great Citie of Athens.

ø. IIII. How PERDICCAS emploied his Armie.

Ing Aridaus living under the rule of Perdiceas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vie of him. Perdiceas had no Province of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom hee should visit in his Gouernement. A stronger Armie then any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that vnsetled condition of thinges to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleopatra, the sifler of Alexander; yet about the same time he either married Niese the Daughter of Intipater, or made such love to her as blinded their eies, who did not somewhat narrowly fearch into his doings.

10 Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Countrie, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood : following the example of his forefathers, cuen from Pharnaces the first that raigned in Cap-Padocia, who married Atoffa lister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancesters had (indeede) beene oppressed by the Persians; but what Fortune tooke from them at one time, Vertuerestored at an other, and their faithfull Princes had much increased all: But now in the strall Period of to great an Empire, with much wisedome, and (Darue being slame), wish sufficients honour, he might have acknowledged the Assessment unthe Persons. To shee did not; neither did Alexander call him to account being occupied with greater cares. But Persiceas, who had no greater butiness wherein to entertaine his Armie, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in land Kingdome, surrounded with Provinces of the Meterotic and to this owner particular to have one opportune place of sure retrait, vader the governement of a steedish friend. Therefore he entred Cappa'seas, tought with Arwathes, who drew into the field thirtie thousand foot, and to sifteen thousand borfe (astrong Armie, had it not incountred astronger, and better trained). Wanne the victorie; and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light ypon; and so delivered that Provinceto Emmens, whom of all men living be trusted most.

Another part of his forces he had committed to Python; rather as to the most honourable of fuch as remained about him, than as to the most affured. Python was to subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Afa. Aboue twentie thoufand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the bai barous Nations, were soone wearie of their 20 unpleasant habitations, and therude people, among whom they lived and therefore tooke advantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselves a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to deftroy them: which intent of his Perdiceas discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebells to the sword, giving the spoiles of them to his Souldiers. and further enjoyned it vnto Pythons Captains (his owne creatures) that they should fee this command executed. These directions for vse of the victorie might haue proned needleffe; fo vncertaine was the victorie it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebells commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessitie to a Hill not farre off. This dif 30 maied the rest, and gaue the day to Python: who being farre enough from Perdiceas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their lines and libertie under condition of laying downe their armes; and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies hee might well have a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselse as free Lord of any Territorie. He had thirteene thousand soot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needleffe feare without great loffe had caused to leave the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse whereof Python might thinke himselfe assured, was ( and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdices. For by his command were ten thousand foote, 40 and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, leavied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obaying the letters of Perdiceas, by which they were enjoyned to give affiftance to that bufineffe; and by vertue of the precept given vinto them by Perdicess, did the Macedonians cut in peeces all those poore men who had yeelded themselues; leaving Python as naked as hee came forth to returne vnto his

Now was Perdicess mightie aboue the mightie, and had faire leifure to purfue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himfelfe Lord of all: but this muft be feeretly carried for feare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lawiss warre taketh ending.

Q. V. The processe of the Lamian Warre.

W

E left Antipater hardly belieged, wanting meanest offee himselfe with out succours from his friends in A.ia. Those helps not appearing so soon cas he expected, he came to parle with Legithers, & would have yeelded wito any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed hope of victoric doe seldome limit their desires. Legithers willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him fuch a difto honorable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was far enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the detence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victualls. In this lingring war, the Atolians (whether wearie of fitting still at a fiege, or having bulinesse which they pretended at home) tooke their leave, and returned into their owne Countrie. Their departure left the trenches fo thinly manned, that Anipater found meanes to fallie out vpon his enemies to their great loife: for many were flaine, and Leosthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieued, their victualls wasted, and they were not firong enough to deale with the Greekes in open fight. Craterus was long in com-20 ming. Ly/imachus who was nearest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his owne leading no more than 4000, foote, and 2000, horse, against Seuthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field aboue foure times that number; and though Lyfmachae, not without loffe, had gotten one victorie, yet the enemie abounding in multitude felt not the blow fo much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earneftly follicited by Antipaters friends, to make all hast to the rescue. He had the gouernement of Phrygia the leffe, and was able to raife an Armie of more than 20100 foot, and 250c. horse, whether leauled out of his Province, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the journie into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come.

30 For Cleopatra had written vnto him, defiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Maccdon, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife; which letters he kept not folosis that beene requisite; and therefore brought himselfe into great suspinion, that soone ended with his life. *Antipollus, chosen Generall by the *Athenians in place of Leophenes, hearing of his approach for sook the steepe of *Lama, and tooke the readie way to the segreat Conquerors of *Assa.* with purpose to give them an euill welcome home, before *Aripater* and they should joyne in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the *Assa.* the advantage of *Leonatus* in horse, by the ods of *200. 49 vertue of the The [filins] which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himfelfe, who fighting valiantly was driven into a marish peece of ground, where hee found his death, which desperately he had sought among the Inciuns, but it waited for him at home not far from the place of his nativitie. He was the first of Ackanders Captains which died in battell, but all, or most of the rest, shall follow him the same way. After this day the Athenians slid never any thing surable to their ancient glorie.

The vanquilhed Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, & too proud to file. They be took e them felues to high grounds, wrift for fervice on hore-back, and fo abode in fight of the enemie that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their camp, and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their of frength to be at the greatest, and fearing left that of the enemie should increase, did camelly seeke to determine the matter quickly by an other battalle. But fill Antipater kept him lesses on many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemie to be variquished. This rechlesses (incorrigible in an Armie of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were much defaced by loffes at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to have made themselues once againe Malters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captiuitie of Greece came on, of which shee neuer could be deliuered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Armie hauing made great marches from Cilicia, pailed ouer into Europe, and comming into Theffalie joyned himselfe with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being joyned in one, contained fortie thousand waightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and fiftie thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and fine hundred in horse, in foot eighteene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus 10 labour to avoide the necessitie of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate should returne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so flow in comming, and Antipater so vegent vpon the Greekes, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Thessalans had the upper hand, and held it, untill such time as they perceived their battailes (ouer-laied with multitude) retire vnto the higher grounds, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of a hundred and thirtie men, they had purchased only the death of some fine hundred enemies. Yet hercof was 20 great vse made. For the Greekes, as not subject vnto the full command of one Generall, and being eueric one defirous to preferue his owne estate, and Citie; concluded to make a treatic of peace with Antipater; who being a fubtile artificer, & well vnderstanding their aptnesses of division, refused to hearken to any generall composition, but willed euery Citie to deale apart for it selfe. The intent of his deuise was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greekes chooling rather to abide the comming of their Alfattants, whose vnreasonable carelesnesse betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus belieging & winning some townes in Thessalie, which the armie of the Confederates wanted meanes & courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne affured and prefent calamitie. 20

Of the peace granted to Athens by ANTIPATER. Of DEMOSTHE-

NES his death.

He The Salians falling of, all the rest soone followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward inviting fuch as were flack. Only the Athenians and Atolians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, having beene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the feate of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who fate 40 fill at Athens, denifing upon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their confultation could finde iffue. He was readie to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to relift, and were as heartleffe as friendleffe. All that remained was to fend Embaffadors defiring peace upon fome good termes: necessitie enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassige; Phocian as the most Honorable; Demades as a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Intipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisedome, graunic of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of leffe regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Intipater calling to minde the pride of Leoshbenes, required of the Athenians that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and entertaine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing CHAP.3. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

the gonernement of the Citie to those of most wealth, deprining of the right of suffrage all fuch as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, ail men of good subitance, to whom the adminiltration of the Common-wealth was given, a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Lemocratie. But the rafcall multitude of beggarly perfons, accustomed to get their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from hearing offices and giving their voices, cried out that this was a meere oligarchie, the violent viurpation of a few incroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had beene wont to fay, That warre to them was to peace, and peace warre) Anipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leaning as few of them as he could to moleft the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspitions and hatred) hee caused Lemosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to bee slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demoji henes, beene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very milde; whereas now all fach, as either are delighted with the Orations of Lemosthenes, or have fur-rendred their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him vtterly, calling him a bloudie tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all civill Nations, that the e-20 uill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemilh any action, how good focuer otherwife it be, or honourably carried.

Lemoghenes had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calaria; there did Archias (fent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perfuade him to leave the place, but not fo prevailing he threatned violence. Then Demofibenes, entreating a little respit as it had beene to write fomewhat, secretly tooke poison which he had kept for such a necessitie, and so died; rather chooling to doe the last execution upon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of fuch as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in batgotaile, howfocuer valiant in perfuading to enterprifes, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through paffages exceeding dangerous. Hee loued monie well, and had great fummes given him by the Perfian, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Ascedonians at home. Neither did hee ill (me thinke ) in taking from the Persians which loued not his Countrie, great rewards, for speaking fuch thinges as tended to his Countries good; which hee did not ceafe to procure; when the Persians were no longer able to give him recompense. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can indure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeue Lucian, who tells vs, That it was Antipaters purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a steadfast enemic to the 40 Macedonisms; therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the handes of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Countrie, yet applying himfelfe to the necessitie of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citic much good, and now procured this peace, which (though gricuousto free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquilhed ) hee endeuoured carefully to preferue.

How CRATERYS and ANTIPATER were drawne from their Ætolian Warres into Asia. The grounds of the first civill Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

Mripater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they firengthned their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Philade, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wise.

Shortly after they went against the Atolians, whose pouertie was 10 not so easily danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, hauing many places of great fastnesse, into which they conneied such of their goods as they most circemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre : with the rest they fortified the strongest of their Cities, and so abode the comming of the Macedonians. whom they manfully refifted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Atolians made good as long as their victualls held out. But when Craterus had thut vp all paffages, and vtteriy debarred them of reliefe; then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their frong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers; or to en- 20 dure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yeeld themselves to the Macedonians : who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave so stubborne enemies in places, which might give confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt confideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Leolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molefled them : wherefore as yet they thought vpon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gratious to their courage. For fuch newes came out of Asia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke every houre a moneth, till they had rid their handes of these Atolians, 30 giving them what socuer conditions they would aske; yet with purpose to call them to seuere account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captiuitic, when once they should have settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is the disposer: in whose high Councell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a trouble some barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so farre from taking effect, that it served meerely as an introduction to all the civill warres

The grounds of the Assistance expedition, which did set the World in an vp-rote, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders: Captaines the mighties in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloued, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Armie. Next vnto the shad most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Armie. Next vnto the shad reduction of the shad per discuss beene; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did mass equal, or superior to the order of the shad per discussion of the shad partner in the government of all: to which purpose here entertained the discourse of marriage with one of Antipater Daughters. But seeling in short space the 50 strength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quire an other way. Aridans was a very simple man, yet served well enough to weare the title of that Majestie, whereof Perdicas being Administrator, and hoping to become proprietarie, the practise was more seuere than had beene in the daies of Alexander.

under: the delire to feeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preferring themselines from contempt, and of giving such a frie lustre to their actions, as may dazell the cies of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher of a were all put to the sword; and how tryannously the King and Princes of Cappaderia were crucified, hath alreadie been eshewed. The Psscains were the next who felt the wrath of these counterstait alexanders. One Citie of theirs was vtterly razed; the children sold for slaues, and all the rest massacred. The Islamins by this example growne desperate, when after two or three daies triall they found themselines whale to continue the desence, lock themselines in their houses and set the Towne on fire, into the slaue whereof the yong-men did throw themselines, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

These exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to lift the aines of the burnt Citie for gold and filver; but Perdieurs had bufine, e of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrarie to his ends, than to fit fill without imploiment : letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whileft cthers grew great, and tooke deeperoote in their feuerall Prouinces. Hee purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the feate of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings 20 presence would make the offices of his Viceroies (during the time) actually voide; Intipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and only Perdice as holding authoritie, the match with Cleopatra might easily bee made. So should greatnefferencete with agood title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomic might giue, who held Egypt, well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia. like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himselfe, or bee driven to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then gouerning in Phrygia, a busic-headed man, and ill affected to the fide, was to bee looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiecus; and was deceiued in so thinking. Antigonus 30 wasasgood a man of warre, of as deepe a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great vn dertaking, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had been eleffe than Sincof theirs, which made him also the lefferespected. But his thoughts were as promus theirs: for, he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiccas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discouer. For Perdiceas haunt with a jealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no at for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might suffice to tab away his life, especially by a Judge that sought his death. This denise and gonss would not feeme to perceive, but prepared himfelfe in shew to make an-40 facte, indeede, to make escape, which casily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne Le netrius aboord of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with fuch tidings, as finished the Atolian warre before mentioned.

As the comming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antigater manifestly perceive that owned anger: to his flight gaue Perdiceas to vinders and that his intentions were lived open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore he prepared as saft after could not only for defence, but (as having on his side the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing slack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomie being advertised of these proceedings, and considering how nearely they concerned him, sided with Antipater. To his government of Expythe had annexed to the Dominion of Cyrene, not without consent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the middless of these garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Mexander with great solemnite, purchasing thereby to himselfe much good will and many partakers, not withstanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie comming against him.

D. VIII.

PERBICCAS his voiage into Ægypt, and his death.

ERDICEAS, vincertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resoluted to let vpon Ptolomie; leaving Eumenes to keepe to his vie, against Craterin and Antipater, the parts of Ajia bordering

It may feeme ftrange, that hee did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men to than Piolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomie: or believed that Craterus would not be readie for him foone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad courfe, and made it worfe with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his fweet behauiour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Per auc. w contrariwife was full of infolencie, which never faileth to beerewarded with hacred; that is truely defined. An affection founded upon opinion of an virguilt contempt. The whole storic of his proceedings in segret is not worth relating: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was upon a little Towne, called the Camels Wall: thither hee marched by 20 night, with more half than good speede; for Ptolomie preuenting him, did put himfeire into the place, where behaving himfelfe not only as a good Commander, but as a flout Souldier, hee gave the foile to Perdices, causing him to retire with losse; after a vehement, but vaine, affault continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made an other journie, (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Milin, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficultie hee beganne to passe ouer his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants about the passage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse-men beneath it; to take up fuch as were carried away by fiviftnesse of the water. A great part of his Ar- 20 mie being arrived on the further banke, the channell beganne to waxe deepe; fo that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chinne, they who should haue followed could finde no footing. Whether this came by rifing of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feet of fo manie Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedie there was, but such as had passed must repaffe againe, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the enemie, and could not be relieued by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the River, wherein above two thousand of them perished. a thousand were denoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger; fuch as were firong and could fwimme recovered the Campe; many 40 were carried downe the streame, and driven to the contrarie banke, where they fell into the handes of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giving libertic to their tongues which long time had concealed the cuill thoughts of their hearts. AVhile they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomie; which did fer themin an vp-rore. Ptolomie had not only thewed much compatition on those who fell into his handes aliue, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcafes, which the River had cast upon his side; and finally, sent their bones and ashes to bee interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only moue the common Souldier, but made the Captaines fail to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so 50 vertuous and honorable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vling them like flaues. The fedition growing strong wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly bated Perdicas, for the difference which hee had fuffered by his procurement, after the victorie vpon the rebellious Greekes. Python had lived in honourable place about A'exander; he was in the divifion of the Prouinces made Gouernour of Media; hee had followed Perdiceas, and being in all thinges (the Protectorship excepted) equall to him, had neuerthelesse beene scornefully vsed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, and a good part of the horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the foot-men having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdicas, where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud misgouerning authoritie of Perdicess. Hee might have lived as great as any, could be have fuffered any as great as himfelfe; yea, peraduenture ma-10 fter of all, had he not beene too masterly ouer those which were a readie his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the campe, where he was joyfully received; he excused himselfe of thinges past, as not having beene Author, or given cause of the Warre, and was eafily beleeved: the favour of the Armie being such toward him, that needes they would have made him Protector in the roome of Perdiceas. But this hee refused. It was an office fit for one, that would seeke to increase his greatnesse with his trouble. Ptolomie was well enough alreadie; wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbare to accept it, and for their well-deferuing of him hee procured that honourable charge to Python, and to Arideus the Captaine, who having had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the folemnities of Alexan-

20 ders Funeralls, did with them adhere to him against Perdiceas.

In the middett of these bulinesses came newes of two great victories obtained by Fumenes; which newes, had they arrived two or three daies sooner, had beene entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would have given fuch reputation to Perdiceas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and hisopen enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the cares which would have giuen them well-come, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of EVMENES in the lower Ala.

Efore wee proceede in the relation of thinges, happening about the person of the King, it is meete that wee speake of those businesses in the lower A/a, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexteritie, whilest Perdiceas was occupied in the Agyptian warres. Aleetas, the brother of Perdiceas, and Reoptolemus, had received command from Perdicess to be affistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answere, That he would not; alleaging the backwardnesse of his men to 40 beare armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much bonoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make faire flew, but inwardly he repined at the Precedencie given to Exmenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discovering, through the counterfaited lookes of Neoptolemus, the mischiefe lurking in his heart, wisely diffembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselfe, that hee might stand vpon his owne strength, he raised out of the Countries under his jurisdiction, about fixe thousand horfe, giuing many privileges to fuch as were feruiceable, and training them well vp. Not without great neede. For when vpon aduertisement of the great preparations 50 made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Helle [pont) for the inua-fion of his Provinces, hee willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeede) aduance, but in hostile manner, though vnprouoked, presented him battaile. Neoptolemus had secretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was thamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians had much the better, and prevailed farre vpon Eumenes his battailes; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting downe their Pikes they cried for mercie. and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull feruice. Antipater and Craterin endenoted with many goodly promifes to draw Eumenes into their focietie, who contrariwise offered himselfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betweene Perdices and Craterm, whom he dearely loued; profeshing with all his hatred to Antipater, and conflant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintaine.

Whilest these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crew to Antipater, and his Affociates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a scribe (at which foolish railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well hee might) with high commendations; affuring them, that it Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voice were but heard by any Olicedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the vietorie was wonne, for they would all forth-with revolt vnto him. Earnestly therefore he defired them to give him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might haue the leading of the Armie to be fent. Their owne affections did ealily leade them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterio might prevaile as much, as the force which hee drew along, 20 For he had in the middelt of A'exanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselves to the Per/ian falhions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behaviour, and apparrell; whereby hee became verie gratious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia, with discontented eies, as reproachfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to joyne with Pool mie. Craterius vied great celeritie, to haue taken Eumenes reuelling (as he hoped) according to the common falhion of Captaines after a great victorie. But hee had a warie and well aduifed enemie to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wifedome forefaw all that was to bee feared, and the 32 meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battaile, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Armie following him: (yet the Armie following him was fuch as much exceeded his owne in footmen, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more vnealic to keepe the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon hee tooke in hand a ftrange peece of worke, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wife managing, prosperously accomplished. Hee gaue out reports that Acoptolemus was returned with fuch companie as hee could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not sarre ost) to joyne with him. Ha- 40 wing animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom hee knew to be despised and hated among them, (as having been vanquithed by some of them, and for saken others in plaine field, whilest they valiantly fought in his quarrell ) hee tooke great care to keepe them from receiuing any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Meffenger nor Trumpetter should bee admitted; and not herewith fatisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him had he beene knowne : but Thracians, Cappadocions, and Persians, under the leading of such as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiecas and himselfe. To these also begaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkening to any word, they should runne upon the enemie, and giue him no leistire to 50 fay or doe any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his owne person: but placing himselfe in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as nec understood) conducted the left wing on the contrarie lide, hee held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and readie to charge the enemic asthorage as the diffance would sine leave. A rifing peece of ground lay between them, which having afcended, the Armies discouered each other; but that of Eumenes enery way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journes, which ouer-hastily they had made, feeking the deceitful iffue of friuolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (hauing failed in furprifing them as enemies), to discouer himselfe to his old friends and tollow fouldiers; of whom hee could be none. Thence Triban and Arthream a ler fun, had the leading of that ide, who mindfull of their instructions beganner o give voon him, with such counide who mindfull of their instructions beganner o give voon him, with such counide. renance as told him his errour; which to redeeme, he bad his men fight and winne to theday, and take the apollero themselves. But the Bears whose skinne hee fells is not you caught. The ground whereon the bastaile was fought gave most advantage to this borle, who encounted very roughly on all parts; especially about Eumenesand exceptolemus who as loances they had discoursed one an other could not contains ships clues but with greatings met bodie to bodie, and letting los fetheir bridlesgrappled to nidlentlying other, that their nortes ranne from under them, leaune both of them tumbling on the ground. Neeptelemus rolefieltyp, bur Enmenes had his (word first crawne, where with bee houghed the other; cauling him to fall downcand hight vportione knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Newhielermes gruing flight ones tooke fuch as were deadly, by which hee died in the 20 place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-aliue) stripped by his mortall enemie; whose rendings hee required, lying even at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followersto runne away ypon the fourre, and fecke helter behind, the battailes of their foot, They were nothing hotly purfued. For Eumenes pained himfelie to carrie fuccout to his left wing, which he suspected much sabe distressed but found accompanied with the fame fortune, that had affifted bine when he fought in person , Graterushad gallanely borne himsele a while, and sustained the impression of artabasus and Phenix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when hee was charged by men of lattle offi-30 mation or note. Otherwise it is not volikely, that he might have either carried the day, of profermed himselfe to a better aduenture by giving ground, as the reft(when heand Meaptolemus were flaine) did. But whilest he sought to preserve his reputation, he loft his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foot by many thatknew him not, and so perished vnknowne, till it was too late to know it, Eumenescomming to the place where hee lay madegreat lamentation, as having alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whose death hee was now become the instrument.

The vanquilhed Armie entertained a Treatic of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willing neffe to become his followers, but their intent was only to refresh them-40 selues, which (by his permission) having done, they stale away by night, and sted toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers tooke the death of Craterus heavily: and the Armies lying further off were inraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incenfed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifeltly appeared, that hee was as forrie as any that pretended greater heautnelle. His Armic wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wifely amended, by giving to them the spoile of such Townes as were ill-affected to him. So hee redeemed the loue of his owne men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him 10 aguard for defence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had beene Traitors to Perdicess hated him for his faithfulneffe, as greatly, as they thought that he would hate them for their fallhood; neither found they any fairer way of exculing their late revolt, than by acculing and condemning the lide which they had for faken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and condemned him to die: but it was an easier matter to giue that sentence, than to put it in execution.

Quarrells betweene Evaydic i the Queene, and Python the Protector.

Python resignes his office, into which Antipa tea is chosen.

YTHON and Aridam being chosen Protectors of King Aridam, and the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Asia the lesse, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of the Set way Python was the greater in reputation, yet faire too weake to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydia, with to King Aridam, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a masculine spirit, well understanding what she ewas or should be, and thinking her felfe able to support the waight which Fortune had laied upon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyma, sister to Mexander by her father King Philip, was married (as hath beene showed) to Amyntas, who was right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the only sonne of King Perditus, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; shee had led Armies, and (as a true fifter of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her felfe, had flaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the fame vnwomanly art of warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were so that Python had some purpose to advance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether only defire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell shee did. which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. The Armie having shaken off 20 fuch a ranke-rider as Perdiccas, would not afterward be reined with a twined threed. Python bearing himselfe vpon his office took vpon him to give directions in the kings name, which the Queenedid oftentimes controll, vling the same name, with more authoritie, and better liking of the Souldiers. Python, feeing this, would needes refigne his office, whether vpon wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps he thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retaine the place, and have his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successour. Eurydice was nothing sorrie at this course; for now shee thought to manage the affaires of the Empireat her owne wil, being freed from the 40 troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the only powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then living, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord saue only the King their Soueraigne. Yet flee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three thinges: the apparent weakeneffe of her hufband : the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian campe; and the mightineffe of Antipater, who commanding a great Armic neare at hand arrived in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her selfe content. Intipater was 50 of fuch power that hee needed not to worke by any close denifes, as Perdicens had done; he had no concurrents; all the Gouernours of Proninces that remained aliue acknowledged him their better; yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, he tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leauing Antigonia Generall of the Royall Armier to whom for his good fertices done, and to be done against Eumenes, hee gape the rule of Sulfana, betides his former Proninces, and committed into his hands the government of Mix during that warre.

δ. X I.

Antigonvs Lieutenant of Alaxinnes a battaile of Evmenes, and befreyet birn in Nora: the vanquisheth other sollowers of Peadicas, Sere beginnes the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in sew yeares ouergrowing the rest wanted little of spreading it sells ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre vpon Lamenes, Aleetus the brother, and Attalis the brother in-law to Persistant; worke enough to keepe his Armie imployed in the publishe service, it such as it is a first of the best of the service of the service in the publishe service.

keepe his Armie imployed in the publike seruice, till such time as hee might find occasion to make vse of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which hevidertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refused to joyne, hauing vnseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chiefe place. Eumenes had an Armie strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions; 20 but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all wayes of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practife failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if hee himselfe had scattered abroad those letters to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hashily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelesly to himselfe, that he and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies farre off. An other follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in companie with Antigonus) kept his treacheric fecret, referring it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus 30 presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heave wherof Apollonises, Generall of the horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrarie fide, with fuch as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose companie he defired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecouerable mischiese which this traiterous practise brought voon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thruit himselfe into the troupes of Antigonus, and boast of his treacherie. This was some comfort to Eurocenes in the losse of that battaile, which disabled him veterly to keepe the field, and left it very hard for him to make a fafe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much amafed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonia himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possession 40 on of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilest Antigonia held him in chace, turned out of the way, and fetching a compaffe returned to the place where the battaile had been fought; there he burned (according to the maner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and affies of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, railing vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold aduenture bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit : so the newes which Atenander (who was set to looke vnto their cariages) brought and published among them, entired them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, carcleffe, as afteranaffured victorie, and loaden with the spoyles of many Nations, the rewards of 50 their long seruice; all which he might have taken: but fearing least such a purchase their long feruices all which he might haue taken: but fearing leaf fuch a purchase should proue a heauie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope contilled in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Mexander to flie to the mountaines, whiles the detained his men (whom authoritic could not haue restrained) by this sleight, setting them to baite their horses. The Macedonisms extolled him for this courteste, as a

noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to strippe them out of all their wealth, and make their children flaues, and to rauish their wives: but Antigonue told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good wil to them; but out of meere subtiltie had anoided those precious fetters, which would have hindered his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all carriages to be ouer-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublefome than availeable, in his intended courfe. Wherefore he fent them from him, as fast as he could, withing them to shift for themselves; and retaining onely five hundred horse, and two hundred foote. When hee had wearied Antigonus awhile in following him vp and downe, he came to North where againe, keeping no more a- 15 bout him, than necessitie required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a litle Fortresse in the borders of Lycaonia & Cappadocia, so strongly lituated that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualed and stored with all neceffaries, that it might hold out for many yeares. Thither did Antigonus followe him, with more delire to make him his friend, than to vanquilh him in warre. To this purpose he entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Intigonus offered him pardon, and his love; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces. which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vot where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his iournic into Pissidia against Alcetas and Attalus, with whom hee made short worke. 29 He came vpon them vnexpected, and feifed on paffages, which wanted not men, but fuch a Captaine as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetas and Attalus, as they had beene too secure before his comming, so were they too aduenturous in fighting at the first light, upon all disaduantages: and their folly was attended with sutable euent. Attalia with many principall Captaines was taken; Alcetas fled to the Citie of Termesus, where the love of the yonger fort was toward him so vehement, that stopping their cares against all perswations of the ancient men, they needes would hazzard their liues and their Countrie in his defence Yet this availed him nothing. For the Gouernours of the Towne, having fecretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the yong men to fally out; and vsing the time of advantage, they with their 20 feruants did fet vpon Meetas, who vnable to refilt flew himselfe. His dead body was conucied to Antigonus, and by him barbaroully torne was call forth without buriall. When Antigonus was gone, the yong men interred the carcasse with solemne funerals, having once beene minded to fet on fire their owne towne, in revenge of his death. Such fauour had hee purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great focuer, is insufficient.

Q. XII. PTOLOMIEWINNES Syria and Phanicia. The death of ANTIPATER.

🚙 Hilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Gouernments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Onely Ptolomie looking abroad, wanne all Syria and Phanicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkeable for any circumstance in the mannaging. He sent a Lieutenant thirber with an Armie, who quickly tooke Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdicess; but (as may feeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, farre from affiftants, and vainely relying vpon the authoritie which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with feeking to maintaine him in his Office.

Antipater was old and fickely, defirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. Hee had with him Polysperchen, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captaines, that had lately supprefied a dangerous infurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had flirred in the quarrell of Perdicess, prenailing farre at the first, bot foone loofing all that they had ; gained, whileft Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Poly/perchon, Intipater did repose great confidence; so farre foorth, that (suspecting the youth of his owne Sonne Caffander of infufficiencie in fo great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Gouernment of Mucedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protect orfhip. So Antipater died, being toure-score yeares old, having alwavestrauailed in the great affaires of mightic Princes, with fuch reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was icalous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly give place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. to In his private qualities he was a fubtile man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosophicall behaulour, not valearned, as having beene Scholler to Ariffolie, and written some Histories. He had beene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Sonne hee compelled to abiliaine from comming into Micedonia, or entermedling in matters of citate: yea, at his owne death he gaue efpeciall direction, that no woman should bee permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was foone forgotten; and yet, ere long, by forrowfull experience approued to have beene found and good.

of POLYSPERCHON who fucceeded anto ANTIPATER in the Protector-fing. The infurrection of CASSANDER against him.

OLYSPERCHON was very skilfull in the art of warre, having long time beene Apprentife in that occupation; other qualities, requilites in fo high an Office as he vnder-went, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He mannaged his builtieffe more formally, then wifely, as a man of a fecond wit, fitter to affift, than commaund in chiefe. At the first entrance vpon the stage hee called to coun-30 faile all his friends, wherein, for waightie confiderations (as they who waighed not the contrariereasons held them) the Queene Olympias was remoked out of Epirus into Mucedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouernours of Prouinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needfull or casie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all maiestie, that might give authoritie to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard contains within the bounds of duetic fuch as could not by force have been kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

49 Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of fight, whilest present mischiefe laie vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discouer that great sufficiencie in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much considence: neither could hee discerne such oddes in the qualitie of himfelfe and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was left Captaine of one thousand, which Office by practise of those times was of more importance, than the title now feemes to implie. He should thereby have beene as Campe-mafter, or Lieuetenant generall to the other: a place no way fatisfying his ambition, that thought himfelfe the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had 50 relied on his Father were his owne affured, especially such as commanded the Garrifons beflowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had beene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the fide, and drawe in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular Vauu 2 to adhere vnto the Captains by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obaying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Cassander had the secret loue of Queene Eury. dice, who had in private rendered him such courtetie, as was due only to her hufband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebeilion; because hee saw Polysperchon much reuerenced among the Macedonians, and itrong enough to suppresse him before he could have made head. Therefore he made thew of following his pleasures in the countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, adulfed 10 with them upon the fatelt course, and most free from all suspition. The necessitie was apparant of railing an Armic, before the bufinefle were fet on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his gouernement of Agypt and Cyren . this was too much either for the hing to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus vpon the first newes of As ipaters death, beganne to lay hold vpon all that he could get, in such fort that hee manifestly discovered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Ala. These two therefore stood in neede of a civill Warre; which Callander well noted, and prefumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betweene his Father and them, would availe him formewhat. Whereupon hee fe- 20 cretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conneied himfelfe on a fodaine ouer the Helle pont, that he might in person advance the businesse with greater speede. Muco persivation is needlesse in winning a man to what he defireth. Antigonius coueted nothing more, than to finde Poly/perchon worke by raifing some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Caffander did very carnelliy presse him, by the memorie of his Father, and all requisite conjurations, to affift him in this enterprise; telling him that Ptolomie was readie to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedie dispatch. Intigonus on the other side repaied him with the same coine; saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearely loued, hee would not faile to give him all manner 20 of fuccour. Having thus feafted one an other with words, they were nothing flack in preparing the common meanes leading to their feuerall ends.

The unworthic courses held by POLYSPERCHON, for the keeping downe of CASSANDER.

Reat necessitie there was of timely prouision. For Polysterchon necded no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the 40 newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the readie disposition, which might be found in Antigmus and Ptolomie, to the strengthning ofrebellion; and well hee knew that one principall hope of Casiander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Gracian Estate. Therefore (louing to work circum (pectly,) he called an other Councel, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of government should be creeted in all the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawne; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose handes Antipater had committed the supreame authoritie, should forthwith bee cither flaine or banished. This was a fure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raife vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was difelo- 50 fed both an vnthanke full nature in Poly/perchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could be be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Sonne went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose only bountie had inabled him to doe it? or what could bee faid in their defence, who fought to destroy many worthic men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from ftirring against the Macedonians; and in opposition to their private Enemie, canethe rule of thinges to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the I mpire? But as in mans bodie, through finnewes newly iffuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any diffemper in the contrarie hand : fo in bodies politique, the humours of men, subdinided in faction, are more inraged by the difagreeable qualities of fuch as curbe them in their nearest purposes, than they are exasperated by the general opposition of such as are divided from them in the maine trunke. Hereby it comes to passe, that conto traria religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering enemics drawne in; to take part in civil warres; and ancient hatred called to counfaile against injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; thee hath taught the arme to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head : they are deprayed mitetions, which render men fensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ranne vnder the Kings name; but fo, as one might eafily difcerne, that Polysperchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was, That they should follow such directions, as Poly/perchon gaue, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it 20 contained fuch a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sodaine from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appeare to have some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it felfe too base and unfit for a King to vse toward his conquered Subjects, and often-fubdued Rebells.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by POLYSPERCHONS decree. The death of PHOCION.

Euertheleffe the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happie-feeming Proclamation, and fought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was pleating to their haftie defires. Nicanor, as a truftic follower of Callander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menilles (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Anipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who foone after hearing the newes of Intipaters death, cried out vpon Photion, faying, That he 40 had fufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by advertiling them in due time have put into their hands a faire opportunitie of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more gricuoufly would they have beene offended, had they knowne the infructions, which Cafander had given to Wieaner, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retaine Munychia, any injunction to the contrarie not withflanding; but that hee should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Piraus, and fortific that also, which was the principall Hauen, againfithe high-Towne. How to accomplish this herather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giving him fuf-50 ficient cause to doe that, which he would have done without any cause given. They defired him to come vnto their Councell, affembled in the Pricus, there to confider of the Kings Proclamation; whither vpon Phocions word and fafe conduct he came, and carneftly preffed them to hold with Caffander in the warre which was readie to breake forth. Contrariwise they viged him first of all, to make them Masters of Vuuu 2 their owne, which how to vie they might confult afterwards. Each of them refufing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies meafure juttice by profit, yet seldome thriued by that course) practised with Dereyllus. a Captaine following Poly (perchon, and then lying neare at hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Autonor prisoner. But Photion who then governed in Athens, a man very vnlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with fuch a trick of politique difhoneitie, did quietly fuffer him to depart and fane

A teasor hereupon beganne to deuife vpon taking Piraus; not as following now the project of Callander, but profecuting his owne just reuenge. He leavied as many 10 Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he iffued into Piraus, tooke it, and intrenched himselfe therein : to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, faw him now Mafter of both. Aexander, the sonne of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouring all, and addreffed themselves vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending meere mischiefe. which they perceived not, being blinded with the vaine Epiftles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking upon her to command, before thee durit well adventure to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged 2/ teanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held : but hee would first consider 20 more of the matter. Polyberchen had further ordained that the life of Samos thould be rendred vnto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) fo farre from purpoling to let them have Sames that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them have themselves. The commoditie of their Hauens was such, as he would rather get into his owne handes, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His sonne Alexander not ignorant of this, made faire flew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicener, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to entermeddle with the builnesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceiued against him they powred out vpon Phocion depriving him of his Office. This 20 was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the affembly of the Citizens, who distracted with fundric passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought enerie one that best could inueigh against thinges past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the cuill threatning them. In this hurlie burlie was Alexander deniting how he might come to fome good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much prinic conscrence with him; which he could not so secretly carrie, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was fo farre increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seeke saueguard of their lines by slight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commen- 40 dation to his Father, defiring him to take them into his protection.

Poly(perchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, readic to enter with an Armic into Attea. Thither came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deferts, ( having alwaies beene friends to the Macedonians, as farre as the good of their Countrie gaue leave) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Cos inthian, Polysperchons familiar friend, went along with them, (in an euill houre) who promifed to himselfe and them great fauour by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an unftable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of judgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the best of them, easily so changing his intended courses, and doing thinges by the halues, which made him commonly faile of good fucceife. For feare of Caffander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him : out of their love hee gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his minde, and fecke how to get into his owne handes those keies, with which Casander held them fall lockt vp: linding himfelfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a talledifbonourable man, hee stood wavering betweene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athemans perforce at his denotion, would indeede have done well : but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece beganne to call their eies ypon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wifelt way to redceme their good opinion, by giving all contentment vnto the popular faction, which then was growne to be Matter of that Citic. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian 10 Embaffadours come, treading (as one may fay) vpon Phocsons heeles, whom they were fent to accuse. These had solemne audience given to them in the Kings prefence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for oftentations fake was glorified with all exteriour shewes of majestie; yet all too little to change Aridew into Alexander : for heedid nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as hee faw others doe. For beginning of the bulinesse Polysperchen commanded that Dinarchia should be tortured and slaine: This was enough to testific his heartie assection to the Commonaltic of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their lake: whose Embaffadours he then bad to speake. When their errand was done, and answere to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Photion and the rest 20 were pronounced guiltie of treason; but to give sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours fake) referred vnto the ( itie of Athens, because they were Burgesses. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to die. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Photion, a man very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. Fine and fortic times had hee beenechofen Gouernour of the Citic, neuer fuing for the place, but fent for when he was ablent : fo well was his integritic knowne, and fo highly valued cuen of fuch as were no pretenders to the same vertue. Hee was a good Commander in Warre, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, 30 and neuer unfortunate. Neuer did the Citie repent of having followed his counfaile: nor any private man of having trufted his word. Philip of Alacedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) fent him two hundred talents of filter, and offered to bettow you him of four Cities in Africany one which hee would choose. But Phocion refused these & other gifts, howfocuer importunately thrust upon him; resting well contented with his honest pouertie: wherein he lived above fourescore yeares, and then was compelled by the vnjust judgement of wicked men to drinke that poifon, which by just judgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthic man resembling the vertue of their 40 Ancients.

A. X V I.

of POLYSPERCHON his vaine expedition against CASSANDER.

Ot long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piraus; which newes drew Polyfperchon head-long into Attica, with a great Armie, but so ill victualed, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Only hee had giuen some impediment to the enemie; who not contented with defending what he held beganne to looke out, and make new purchases abrode. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to drive Caffander out of Athens, hee left his sonne Aexander, with fuch number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victualls, to withstand his further incroching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Pelaponne us, to make the Countrie fure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnefus were fuch, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he beganne to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratie, or Popular forme of gouernement. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beene made Rulers, should be either flaine, or driven into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: the vulgar fort being very readie to feale the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the bloud of those who had kept them in fubiection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe Citizens; and many which withed well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Poly (perchan meant to inflict an exemplaric punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalop lis had in it fifteene thousand seruiceablemen, well furnished of necessaries, and resolued to endure the worst. And neede there was of fuch refolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his powerdid so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betweene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raifed up an inner wall, to beare out the next affault. The Affailants having failed to carrie the Towne at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, 20 and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the townssimen perceiping their drift prepared boards driven through with long nailes, which they yled as gall-throps, bellowing them fleightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beafts were to paffe. Neither did they fet any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine fight-armed men to beat upon their fides with Arrowes and Darts, as they were inftructed by fome that had learned the manner of that fight in the Afan Warres. Of these prouisions they made happie vse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemie chiefly trufted) either forely hurt, or driven back vpon the Alacedonians, whom they trampled vinder fect. Poly/perchon came as ill fur-nisht for long abode to Megalopolis, as before to Ashens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, hee for fooke the fiege, with fome loffe, and much dilhonour; leaning fome part of his Armie to lie before the Towne for his credit.

After this he fent Clittee, his Admirall, to Sea, to joyne with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all fuccour which might come to the enemie out of Alia. Callander also sent his whole Fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Proportis, where hee fought with Clium, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the ouer-throw gathered together the thips that were escaped, and manning them very well fent out Niemor againe, affu- 40 ring him of the victorie, as well he might. For hee fent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom hee had caused to bee wasted over the Straights in small Veffells by night; these before day-light setting upon Clitus, draue his men, that lay fecurely on the Land, head-long into their ships ; in which tumult Nicanor arriving did affaile them fo luftily, that few or none escaped him.

This loffe at Sea, together with his bad fucceffe by Land, brought Polyfperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloudie decrees; but when the execution was referred to his owne fword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themfelues, and was not able to give them protection against the enemie which lay in 50 their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Gouernour of his appointment; and restoring all thinges to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Casander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted vnto him; as to an industrious man, and likely to prequire in the end. Thus was the whole Countrie fet in a combultion, vicalie to be quenched; which prefented vitto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himselie Lord of Alia.

A. XVII.

ANTIGONVS feekes to make him felfe an absolute Lord: and thereupon treates with EVMENES, who difappointeth him. Phrygia and Lyata Borneby ANTIGONYS.

NTIGONVS had in Antipaters life time a firme resolution, to make vnto himfelfe the vtmoit benefit that hee might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in faire feafon for advancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the busines in Pifelia was dispatched, and no more imployment for the Armie remaining, faue onely the continuance of the flege of Nora; a small thing of it felfe, butas hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Aora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present estate was manitelly lubicit, would in continuance of fome yeares (which hee might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Caltle, his men and horses might grow fickly and unferuiceable: which made him to practife many denifes of keeping them in hearth and luftie. But when he had continued thut vp in this manner about a yeare, his hopes came to good paffe, and he was cafed of his cares by Antigonus himfelfe, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonia knowing the great infliciencie of Eumenes, and confidering his fidelitie she wed ynto Perdice, is, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to imploy in mannaging those high designes, wherein he doubted not 30 that hee should bee withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. Hee sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promiting to make him a greater Lord than ever hee had beene, and the next man to himfelfe, if things fell out as hee defired : in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, hee might at his good pleafure iffue fafely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect libertic. Eumenes perming the forme of the oath perceived the meaning of Antigonia; which was rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding wordes and fumme of all 40 the rest were such, as tied him fast onely to Antigonis, omitting all reservation of dutie to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it vafeemely to become a sworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the mastrie; and being assured that his voluntaric affiftance, which way focuer hee gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would be not therefore breake off the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of inlargement which might perhaps beelong in comming; but feeming to bee well agreed with Antigonus thee prepared to give vp his Holde and depart. As for the oath it felfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough for fuch personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in te-50 stifying their Allegeance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Wora, liked his wordes, and gaue him leaue to put in Olympias, and the children of According binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he deremone some of the Governours of Provinces, behaving himselfe according to the authoritie which hee had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did hee want sufficient pretence whereby to instifie his proceedings. For if Polyperchen might lawfully hold the Protector flip, which the old man doing on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, asalegacie, without confent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not hee himselfe aswell retaine the Leiutenant flup of Asia. that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should seeme convenient whilest hee lived, not to dispose of thinges that should happen after his death? To give a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough: 10 if any were not herewith fatisfied, he had threescore thousand footmen, ten thoufand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answere them.

Antigoniss had taken upon him, as foone as hee came downe to the Sea-fide, to

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to refish him, was Arideus Gopernour of Phrygid; who fortified the Townes of his owne Province, and fought to haue wonne Cycless, a faire Hauen Towne, and feated very conveniently for him, but was faine to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke occasion to commaund him out of the Countrie. Aridam was so farre from obeying him, that he feht forces to releiue Eumenes. Neuerthelesse finding that he was vnable of himselfe to make long relitance, he tooke such companies as hee could draw ealong with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like for- 29 tune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and fought the like remedie of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good wordes) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath alreadie beene declared.

a. XVIII.

ANTIGONVS pursues EVMENES, EVMENES having authoritie from the Court raifeth great warre against ANTIGONVS in defence of the Rotal boufe.

NTIGONV shauing thus gotten into his hands all, or most of Asia the leffe, was able to have entred Macedon, and feifed upon the Court; which that he forbare to doe, it proceeded (as may feeme) for some of these reasons. It would have bred as much icalousie in Caffander, as feare in Polysperchon, which might have brought them to tearmes of reconciliation; It would aske more time then hee could spare; and the enuie which followed the Protectorship was fuch, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to flunne, then to purfue. Befides all this, it was 40 manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war vpon him in defence of the Roiall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well affected. Against him therefore hee bent his course, and withan Armie of twentie thousand foote, and foure thousand Horse, made great hast toward cilicia, hoping to suppresse him before hee should bee able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithful to their dad master, which being well knowne in the Court, hee had commiffion fent vnto him from thence to raife an Armie, and ma'e warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as hee should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouer- 50 nours of Prouinces, requiring them to give affiftance to Eumenes, and bee ordered by his direction : especially to the Captaines of the olde Souldiers, called the Argyrastides, or filter-theelded bands, commaundement was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and suc hundred horse, before this authoritie was given him: but now he purposed with all the strength which hee could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Roiall bloud. Olympias had written to him, deliring him to bring helpe to her and her Nephew the sonne of Alexander; and in the meane time to give her his advice, in that which Poly/perchon required of her: for shee was desirous to returne into Maredon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counfelled her to remaine in Epirus, till fuch time as he could bring the warre to a good iffue; which done, hee promifed that his faith and care should not bewanting to the feed of Alexander.

Strange it is to confider, that in all the Empire scarce any one could bee found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wives, and children, might repole firme confidence, fauing onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian bloud, borne at Cardis, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne vertue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled hee was to trauaile as farre as Persia, to gather together an Armie sufficient, to resist the enemies that purfued his hecles.

XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. OLYMPIAS takes ARIDEVS and EVRYDICE, whom shee cruelly puts to death.

30

Ow, forasmuch as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in ces didentermedale; and great attention berget the parts of Asia, but Macedon it felfe, which brought a new face vnto the parts of Asia, but Macedon it felfe, which brought a new face vnto the parts of Asia, but the extinction of the rotal house of Philip and Alexanthe State, by the extirpation of the roiall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it conuenient in this place, before we enter into the parti-

30 culars of the warre it felfe, to shew breisly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what pallions they were drawne into those courses, which ouerthrew most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremitie the faction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controugrife of title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have beene depending.

Arideus the King, being simple and fearefull, did onely what hee was bid-

Polysperchan, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome, and become Gouernour to a King 40 of his owne making.

Eurydiee the Queene discouering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her hulband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme, till another were growne old enough to lit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Aexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Cassander held fresh in mind, the danger wherein his family had beene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall, for deriding one, that adored him after the Persian maner. The displeasure hereof; and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him resolue, both to suppresse the linage which hee hated, 30 and to maintaine his beloued mistresse, either by supporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife. The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who raigned over all, so as they might raigne in their feuerall Countries, and establish their authoritie in such wife, that it might not be taken from them.

Among

Among these, Prolomie and Antigonia were well enough alreadie, if their ambition would have fuffered them to lee it.

Pitho and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Pencestes and some others with much adoe hardly made relittance, vntill fuch time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with flepdames) hated the children of her hulband by his other wives. It was thought that shee had given poylon to Arideus, which failing to take away his life had much impaired both his bodie and wittes. Now the confidering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home 10 fo foone as the withed that he thould; and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece; thought it the best way to ioyne with Poly/perchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the sonne of Roxane, removing Arideas before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent the procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and fo tooke her way towards Polyffer chon, who ioyning with her entred into Macedon, Eurydice hearing these newes wrote veric carnellly to Cassander, praying him to fet alide all other bulinesse, and come to succour her. Shee herselfe by entreatie, gilts and promifes, grew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as flee could, vntill shee thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her went boldly forth against olympias, and the Traitour Polysperchan.

These two Queenes met armed, as if the matter should have been determined by their owne hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the renolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as foone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding herselfe thus for saken, sled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

O'ympias having obtained this victoric without bloud, thought that all thinges would fucceed as callly, and that vpon the same considerations for which they had tefused to beare Armes against her, the Macedomans would not sticke to maintaine her, what soeuer her proceedings were. Having therefore that vp Arideus and his 30 wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turne round, sheefed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare least the people should haue commiferation of him, that had raigned almost live yeares and a halfe) to put them to death. So she delivered Arideus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice shee sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poylon, willing her to choose the instrument of her owne death, who praying that the like prefents might one day bee fent to Olympias, yeelded her necke to the halter, having spent her last curses not invaine. Nicanor the brother of Casimder, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did olympias then choose out, all whom shee commaunded to be flaine. His brother Iolans that was alreadie dead and buried, flice 40 accused of poyson given to Alexander; and thereupon caused his Tombe to bee throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroade. The Macedonians wondering at this furie, began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge giuen on his death bed, called this outragious woman to the gouernment of the Empire.

How CASSANDER Wasrenenged upon OLYMPIAS.

The great expedition of CASSANDER. OLYMPIAS thuts her felfeinto Pydna, where CASSANDER beslegeth her. ÆACIDES King of Epirus, comming to Juccour OLYMPIAS, is forfaken, and banished by his owne Subjects.

ASSANDER at that time laic before Tegea, in Peloponne [ue; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, hee never staied to take the Citie, nor to give order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the sonne of Posysperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, hee willed his af-

20 fociates to looke to themselves as well as they could, till his returne, and so in all hast he tooke his journie toward Macecian, carried headlong with the greedie delire of justreuenge. The Atolians had taken the Straights of Thermopyle, in favour of the Queene and Polysperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to mispend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could, great and small, with which hee transported his Armie into Theffalie. There hee divided his companies, appointing fome under Callas, a fubtile Captaine, to hold Polysperchen builed, who then lay incamped neare to Perbabia; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. Shee, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignitie, tooke more care now to appeare Maiefficall, than to make herfelfe strong. To this end 30 shee made a solemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well senced, having in her companie all the flowre of the Court especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her yong fonne Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designement: who, during his minoritie, kept the Soueraigne power inher owne handes. But all this pompe ferued to little vie, against the violence of the enemie, that foone presented himselfe before the wals; onely it fed the befored with a vaine hope of fuccour, that would from all partes arrive, to refeue persons of their qualitie. And hereof there foone appeared faire likelihood, which as foone vanished, and went away in smoke.

For Lacides King of Epirus, made great hast to bring succour to Olympias, his co-40 fen, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also thut vp. Neuertheleffe, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine paffages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterprise. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceed and the obstinate refusal of the Armie, brakeout at length into fuch termes, that when hee had raged in vaine against the multitude; his authoritie, with which he thought to have prevailed your them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to for fake his Kingdome, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countries, a banished man; his people ioyning with the enemie, against whom he had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was closed up straightly, both by Sea and Land, so that 10 neither any could iffue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe bee conucied into it; but it held out as long as any food was left; no memorable feruice being done there, whilft great actions were mannaged abroade.

A continuation of OLYMPIAS her storic. POLYSPERCHON defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. OLYMPIAS yechsto CASSANDER.

 $N_{\it Eumenes}^{Ow}$ , though order of time require it, that wee should rehear se the doings of  $\it Eumenes$  and  $\it Antigonia$  in this place, leaving Olympus yet a while to the hower of her destinie, which growes the fatter you her, because thee may discerne it comming; yet that we may not bee compelled to interrupt the course of our narration, 10 by inferting her Tragedie in the midft of things, not manifefully coherent with it; we will heere (as elfewhere wee have done and elfwhere mult) continue to an end one Historie, that we may not be therewith distracted, when wee shall come to the rela tion of another. All the hope of the befeiged, remaining in Poly/perchen, was in like maner disappointed, as their former trust had beene, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was fent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Armie with monie, leauing him within a little while so flenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other bulinesse of warre, than a swift retrait. When famine had so farre prenailed in the Citie, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many men feeding on the dead careasses of their fellowes, 20 and fawdust being given to the Elephants for provender; some of the souldiers obtain ning the Queenes leaue; (who could not denie it) others, without asking leaue, vecided themselves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieued, and sent abroad into the Countrie. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her wel-willers, that fuch as had referred themselves to the cuent, came in a pace and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortality was so great in the Towns, that the living were such poyloned with the noylome lent of the dead; Olympias bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that shee had: wherein her successe was as bad as in the rest. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to be evnto her as a house of torment, and a laile, 3% out of which thee thould not be deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore vtterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, vnaccustomed to so wretched a kinde of life, shee offered composition; and with much labour hardly obtained of Gasander (who having fetcht her Gally out of the Hauen, accounted himselfe as good as master of her bodie) a graunt of her owne life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Caffander. Amphipolis did fland out: for Ariflonus, to whom Olympias had giuen charge of fuch forces as were left abroad in the Countrie, taking courage from the fuccesse of some pettic services wherein hee had prevailed, beganne to promise himselfe great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to winne Cassanders fauour, very ear- 40 neftly required him upon his faith to her, that he should give it up. Hee did so; and prefently after was killed by his private enemies, that were fet on by Caffander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke in

The death of OLYMPIAS, and her Condition.

Hen Opmpin had now heard for rowfull tidings of all her friends, thee har 50 felfe was called into queftion, and accufed in an affembly of the Office is mans, for the murthers (they were fo filled in her affliction, which in time of profession for the fell diplice) by her committed. There was thee, (being not heard nor called to fpeake) condemned to die. The futte was commenced and profession red against her, by the kindred of those whom she had flaine. But it was at Casander initigation; who (to halten the execution) fent her word that he would furnish her with a thip and other necessaries, to saue herselfe by flight: which when she retuled, faying that thee would plead for herfelfe, and tell her owne tale; hee diffembledno longer, but fent vnto her fuch men as hated her most, who tooke away her miferablelite. Shee was daughter and fifter vnto two Kings of Epirus, wife and mother vnto two the mightielt Kings of that or many other ages, a ftout Ladie, and of vnreproueable chastitie, but her ambition was boundlesse; her hatred vnappeasable, and her furie in reuenge most vinwomanly. Her peruer se conditions made her hulband feeke other wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and 10 them. She was thought prinie toher husbands death; after which, very cruelly the flew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beaftly furie broiled the other aliue in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her some Alexander (otherwise louing her well) forbad her to meddle in the gouernment of Macedon. But God, more seuere vnto cruell Tyrants, than onely to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to liue and fulfil the rest of her wickedneffe; (which was his justice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others) after all which hee rewarded her malice by returning it vpon her

CASSANDER celebrates the funerall of ARIDEVS and EVRYDICE; and feckes to make himselfe King of Alicedon.

A Fter her death, Callinder gaue honourable buriall to Aridem and Eurydice, among their Progenitours, Kings of Assedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatneffle, he married the Ladie Thefidonica, whom he had taken at Pydas, being the daughter of King Philip by an other of his wives; that by her hee might have some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and heryong sonne, to close prison, remoning thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to increase his same, and purchase love, hee built a Citic, called by his owne name Callindria, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He readined likewise Tables in Greece, and reforced it vnto the old jinhabitants, after it had laine twentie yeares wast, being vtterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes, especially by the restauration of Tables, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so fit ones, that few remained enemies vnto him, and they, with much labour, hardly could ress thim. Leauing him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Assa

The journie of EVMENES into Persia. His wife dealing with thofe that toyned with him.

MENES, having joyned vnto his companie the Argyra/pides, made haft into the Eafterne parts to take polleffion of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfe against antigenus. He tooke his journey through Calefyria and Phanicia, hoping to reclaime those Prouinces, vsurped with the reit of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by 20 Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haft of his paffing forward was too great, his Armie too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returne to their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the leffe effectuall. The Captaines of the Argyrafiides were fo froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions; and their sidelitie was fo vniteadie, that he might have more easily dealt with open Traitours. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authoritie by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulsion. Therefore hee 20 fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely in a rich paulion, wherein an emptie throne was placed, as if Alexander himfelfe had beene prefent at their confultations. Thus hee freed himfelfe from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could have no affurance. Yet when Ptolomie requested them, & Antizonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without confidering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, fending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings authoritie, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus, Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to relie vpon their affistance, who flood otherwise af- 40 fected than his affaires required, and were not to bee dealt with by perfivation, fought passage by strong hand, through the Countrie of Babylon, in such wife, that Selenens, having in vaine affaired to hinder him, by opening the fluces of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as defirous to be ridde of him. Thus he came to Peuceftes and the reft of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his companie, because of the differences between Pytho, Seleneus, and themselues. Yet the contention about superioritie, grew very hot among them; enery one finding matter enough, to feed his owne humour of felfe-worthinesse. But the former deuice of affembling in one paulion, made all quiet; the conclusion euer being fure to follow that which Enmenes propounded, who was both wifeft in giving advice, and 50 best able to reward, by meanes of the authoritie given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes hee wonne to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt.

CHAP.4. S.2.3. of the Historie of the World.

How ANTIGONVS, comming to fet upon EVMENES, was drinen off with loffe.

NTIGONVS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Sufa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he removed out of Mefor otamia, where hee had wintered; and taking to him Pitho and Seleucus, with their men, hee marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Cattle of Sufa, and was retired backe toward Perlia, keeping the River of Tigris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riuer were well garded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonus, to obserue which way he tooke. Before he came to Tigris it felfe, he was to paffe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, which he fought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tigris, came with a thouland horse, and soure thousand foote, to see their demeanour; and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and 20 draue them headlong backe into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned weriefew escaping with life, except foure thousand that yeeled themselves prisoners, in fight of Antigonus, that was not able to releiue them. This loffe made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heate of that Countrie in the dog-daies, breeding difertes inhis Armie, by which many perilhed, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Pithon with him; (leaving Selenciss to before the Castle of Su/a) and seeking to goe the nearest way, passed through sauage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmilhes, flew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

Of EVNENES his cunning. A battaile betweene him and ANTIGONVS.

Fter his departure, Eumenes with his affociates fell into confultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine he would have had them to enter vpon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left be hind tim; to which also the Captaines of the Argyraspides or Silverhells were verie inclinable, as defiring to draw neater to Greece. But Peuceftes, and the rest, whose Dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needes march Eastward. These carried it; for the Armie was not strong enough to divide it selfe in-

When they came into Persia, Pencesses ruling there, seasted them royally, and sought by all meanes to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Enmenes, perceiuing whereunto those doings tended, suffred him awhile to keepe good cheare, till the time of warre drew neere. Then did he faine an Epiftle, directed, as from Orontes Gouernor of Armenia, to Peucefres himselfe: The purport wherof was, that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and fent over a great Armie vnder Polysperchon, to jovne with Eumenes.

59 These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine joy, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willing neffe to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likelicst apparance of their preferment, wherein they dealt wifely, hee being farre the most fufficient Commaunder, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media drew necre vnto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sicke, and Xxxx 3 fame to be carried in a litter; the Armie marched in verie bad array, and was likely to have beene forced to take battaile in that diforder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his litter, and vpon the fodaine did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonia, perceiuing him a farre off, could not refraine from giving him descrued commendations. Yet he did not ceale to promife great rewardes to the Captaines, and all forts of men, if they would for lake Eumenes: which hopes deceiuing him, hee came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, hee was inferiour in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The battaile was fought with variable fuccesse, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and 10 of the night following. Yet the victoric was vicertaine. For Eumenes could not force his men to lie farre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonus (who had a more absolute commaund ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the figne of victorie; for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies, crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater figne of victorie had Eumenes. For he abode ftill in the fame place and not onely buried his men verie honourably, at great leifure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to fleale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

ò. IIII.

Of diverse stratagems practifed by ANTIGONVS, and EVMENES, one against the other.

Hus did the warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part having flout Souldiers, and skilfuil Generals: but the fide which had nitherto preuting, companies to the equall authoritie of many, from purfuing all advantages to the best. Antigonus grew daily weaker in men and reputation, so that to 30 repaire himselse hee could find no way safer, than to put all to aduenture. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre afunder, so that if hee could fuddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great diffresse. Betweene him and them, the way was not long, being onely nine dayes journey, but very bad, through a rough drie wildernesse, hardly passeable. Another way, fairer, and leading through a Countrie well peopled, but requiring twentie fine dayes journey, hee for looke, partly for the length, partly and chiefly, because hee would come vndiscouered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbad vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not have them descried a farre off. This commaundement had beene well observed fourc or fine dayes, 40 when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bolde to cherish themselves, being neare to their waves end. The light of these fires gaue notice of their comming; which being reported to Pencestes, and other Captaines, they were so assonished with the sodaine danger, that in all hast they betooke themselues to slight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to hearten his affrighted companions, promifing to make Antigonis march leafurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their mentogether. They could scarce beloeue him; yet they were content to be ruled, and did as hee appointed, who failed not in making his word good. Hee tooke with him some companies of the readiest men, wherewith hee occupied certaine toppes of 50 mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient ground to incampe vpon, and made great flore of fires in fundric places, as if the whole Armie had beene present. This was a forrowfull spectacle to Antigonis, who thought himfelfe preuented of his purpose; and began to feare least hee should bee compelled compelled to tight, whileithis men were tired with a long and painefull journey. Therefore he resolued to turne aside, & take the way to such places, as might better ferue to refresh his Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how readie Eumenes would be vpon all advantages. But after a while, confidering that no enemie flirred about him, he began to pause, and thinke in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some juhabitants of that Desert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom hee learned, that they had seene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hil-tops. 10 It vexed him exceedingly to finde that hee had beene so deluded. Therefore hee went against these troupes with great furie, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not bee forced without much bufineffe, and long flay. All the Armie was come, faue onely Endamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who; besides those beastes, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his companie. Antigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent about two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and fo to defend himselfe as well hee could; for his horsemen, overlaid with multi-20 tudes were quickly broken, and driuen to runne away vpon the spurre. Neither knew they, who fate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all iides they received woundes, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came vnexpested to therefeue; and charging the affailants upon the backe, draue them to fecke their owne fafetie by speedie flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though hee knew not what his adversarie meant to doe, yet hee knew very well what was fittell for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, prouided the re-

Surely, it is great jniuffice to impute the mischiefe, contriued against worthie men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deseruing : For, though it often happen, that fmall vices doe ferue to counterpoyle great vertues; (the fense of cuill being more quicke and lasting, than of good ) yet hee shall bewray a verie foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will thinke it a part of wisedome, to find good reason of the cuills, done to vertuous men, which often times haue no other cause than their vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtelle, of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and 50 carefull by all gentle meanes to winne their loue, that seemed to beare him any secretillaffection. It was his meere vertue that ouerthrewhim, which even they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee should not bee flaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigenus, wherein they confessed that it flood best with their safetie, to bee gouerned by his directions. Of this trea-fon, he was quickly aduertifed by Eudamus, to whom hee had done many pleafures, and by some others of whom he yied to borrow monie when he needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for feare of loofing their owne. Confidering therefore, and discoursing with himselfe of the villanie intended against him, hee made his last will, and burnt all his writings that contained any matter of fecret: which done, hee revolued many things in his minde; being doubtfull what course were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall bloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number. than in worth. How things at that time flood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to feeke their 10 heloe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had beeneagainst his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that hee forbare, either to loose the battaile willingly, or to flie into Cappadecia, and make shift for himselfeamong his old friendes. At length hee refolued to doe his best against the common enemie, and afterwardes to looke to himfelfe as well as he might.

Q. VI. The last battaile betweene Anticonvs and EVNENES.

He Souldiers, especially those old bandes of the siluer-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in arraie; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischeinously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke vpon being beholding to him for the victorie. Yet hee ordered the battaile fo well, that, without their owne great fault, they could hardly 20 faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horseman from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednesse, in fighting against their owne fathers, would now bee punished, asit well descrued. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Silver-shrelds were men of threescore or seauentie yeares olde, strengthned more by continual exercise, than decaied by age, and excelling in courage, as having paffed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often beene beaten by them, and were now to tric their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Auncient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew verie pensiue, 40 and advanced heavily, suspecting their owne cause, and searing that the threatnings vitered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gave him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine levelled field. Placing therfore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Pithon, he did fet forward couragiously against the enemies, that were readie to give him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Pencefles, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the left wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonius, meaning both to prevent the Traitours his Companions of all meanes to make head against him on the sodaine, and so (withall) to give proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, oppolite vnto Pithon, hee bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, under one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at fuch a time) obedient : commaunding him to protract the fight, and make a leilurable retrait, expecting the euent of the other fide. So they joyned verie fiercely; Antigonia, labouring to make himfelfe mafter of all Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne fuch a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might give him leifure and opportunitie to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonas, being, euen in their owne opinions, farre interious to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently deseated by the Silver finelds, who flew about fine thousand of them, looling of their owns, not one man. But in horse, Enmenes was so over-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who prefled him very hard, but was faine to fland wholy your defence. Yet in his courage wrought to well by example, among his followers, that the enemie could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill fuch time as Peucejles, with one thousand fine hundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battaile, leaving his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperatly rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonus himfelfe. And though hee failed of his purpo ex yet with great flaughter he did so beate vpon them, which came in his way, that the victorie hung a long time in suspense, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a flight fandie mould, through the trampling of horfes, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloude of dust; as hin-20 dered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this aduantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed vndiscouered beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, flenderly garded, (for that the whole bodie of the Armie lay betweene them and danger) and therefore easily taken. Had Peaceffes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, he might not onely have defended them, but peraduenture have furprifed those which came to surprise them & so have done as good a peece of service as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the euent: and Eumenes was so ouer-laboured both in bodie and minde, that he could not give an eye to e-30 nery place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened to, that the Elephants meeeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand, whereupon Eumenes, finding himselfe enery way ouer-charged, began to give backe, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order; to the other fide of the battaile, where Philip (as hee was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loffe. The Antigomans had felt fo much of Eumenes that day, that they were well contented to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he would have done.

The loffe of the carriages was reported vnto him, as foone as he had any leifure to heare how thinges went, whereupon hee presently ordered his men for a fresh 40 charge, and fent for Peucefles that was not farre off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby hee trufted, not onely to recouer their owne goods, but to inrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not onely refused to joyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from fuch dangerous temptations.

By this the night grew on; and both Armics, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigonus conceined hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horfemen, he waited upon Eumenes apart of his way homewardes, but found no opportunitie to offend him: the other halfe heecommitted to Pithon, willing him to fet vpon the Silver shields in their retrait; which 70 yethe forbare to doe, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigonus had not fo much the better in horse, as the worse in foot : but the spoile which hee got, by surpriting his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other loffes,

How EVMENES was betrayed to A NTIGONVS, and flaine.

V MENES, comming into his Campe, and finding the Silver-fhields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheare them vp, and put them in hope of recourring all with aduantage. For their braue demeanour that day had so crushed the enemie, that hee had no power left wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much leffe able to drawe their Cartes after him, through that great Wilderneffe, ouer the high mountaines.

But these perswasions availed nothing. Pencestes was gone; the other Captaines would needs returne into the high Countries; & the Souldiers had no defire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captaines of the Silver-shieldes, (who had in former times readily contented vnto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making him selfe great, and winning the love of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to reflore vnto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the onely reward of their feruices in the warres of Philip, and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a fubtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with a little entreatic performe a great deale more than they promifed; and therefore he louingly entertained the mellengers, filling them with hopes of greater matters than they defired, if they would put Eumenes into his handes, by whom they were feduced to make warre against him. This answere pleased them so well, that they forthwith denised how to deliuer him aliue. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutie, and pretending more joy of their victorie, than forrow of their losse, which they faid they would redeeme by another fight; in the middeft of this goodly talke they leapt upon him, caught hold of his fword, and bound him fast. So they ha- 30 led him away; and stopping their cares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so farre, as to loofen one of his handes and let him kill hin felfe, but brought him aliue (that was their owne Generall, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had beene in triumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campetosee him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine to fend a gard of horsemen and Elephants, to keepe him from being fmothered, whom he could not fodainly refolue either to kill or faue. Verie few they were that fued for his life; but of thefe, Demetrius the fonne of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if hee were faued, he would foon be the chiefe in great reputation, for his great abilitie. So 40 after long deliberation, Antigonus cocluded, that it was the fafest way to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keepe it awhile in his own power to reuerfe the fentence, as deliring (if it might be) to have him line hisfriend; haft of other bufineffe made him doe it by the fword.

To this end came all the travailes of the worthic Generall, Eumenes; who had with great wisedome, fidelitie, and patience, laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie, but more notable was his government of himfelfe in all her changes. Aduerlitie neuer leffened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Armie, 50 without full power to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gaspar de Collignie, Admiral of France, in our dayes, to one that foretold his death, which enfued foone after in the maffacre of Paris. That rather than to leade againe an Armie of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus

Junigonus himselfe gaue to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserued vengcance. One chiefe Captaine of the Silver Speilas he burnt alive; many of the other Captaines he flew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-flields, that had betraied fo worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carie them into farre Countries, under pretence of warres; but with a prinie charge, to confume them all, as periured wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas, that beate upon the shoares of Greece and Macedon.

ð. VIII.

How ANTIGONYS flew PITHON, and occupied MEDIA. How hee removed Governours of Provinces, and made himselfe Lord of Perlia, carrying away PEVCESTES.

He two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the relt of the Winter; the common Souldier idly; the principall men intentiuely bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Pithan began to consider his owne deservings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefely maintained by the strength and riches of his Pro-

uince. Beides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse it were in the fouldiers opinion, which he judged casie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore foared not to affay them with great liberalitie. But in following this course, hee was driven by necessitie to trust many, of whom he stumbled vpon some, that were unfecret, and others, bearing him no fincere affection. Thus was his purpose discoucred to Antigonia, who (nothing like to Pithon) diffembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of diffention betweene him, and his honourable friend, vnto whom hee meant to commit the Gouernment of all those Countries: his owne businesse calling him into the lower Asa. These reportes, comming 39 daily to his cares, did finely delude Pithon. By his greatnesse with Alexander, his authoritie in that Prouince where they lay, whereof he was Gouernour; and the loue of the fouldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, euen an offenfiue warre. But what neede had he to vie the fword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtain more than his owne asking? Therefore hecame as foone as he was fent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing leffe than to yeeld to any fuch division. As soone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slaine out ofhand. For antigonus, having begunne with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting downe 40 indifferently all that flood in his way: but swamme carelesty through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Gouernour in Media, to order the Province; and a Captaine, to suppresse all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this, he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Ala. There began he to show how well he understood his owne might inesse. For heplaced and displaced, at his pleasure, Gouernours in all Provinces; leaving none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting fuch as lay too farre off to bee 50 diflodged eafily.

Pencefies, who ruled in Perfis, thought with good cheare to redeeme old offences; but was deceived; having to doe with one, that could not be taken with fuch baites: be was carried away, and feafted with goodly words of promife, that neuer tooke ef-Met. Thus he, that enuied the vertue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vaine)

the tortune of his enemie; after which he lived a contemptible life, till hee died obfeurely a man forgotten.

How SELEVCUS mus chased out of Babylon, by ANTIGONUS. The great riches of ANTIGONVS.

ELEVER'S was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good-will to Antigonus, and to now gaue proofe of his heartie affection toward h.m, by making the Captaine of the Callle of Sufa to meete him on the way, rendring vnto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was fo great, that Intigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleiue it; but vsed him with excessive kindnesse, torteare so good a moode should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the lewels of the Perfian Kings, which, added to his former flore of money, made up twentie fine thou fand talents. Having all this, he might well account himselfe a happie man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent, to leaue no 20 Countrie behind his backe, that should not acknowledge him for Soucraigne Lord. Comming to Bibylon, he was entertained by Selenens with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with prefents, befeeming the maiestic of a King. All this he accepted with great grauitie, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the reuenues of that Province. This demaund Seleneus held vnreasonable; faying, that it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Province, which was given vnto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who veged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessitie, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but 20 onely the delire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should find fuch iffue, as Pithon and Peucejles had done. Therefore taking with him onely fiftie horse, he conucied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions, deliring him to protect him from the violence of fuch a man, as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had beene his betters, or at least his equals. Antizonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yeelded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Selenens for them hee wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his defire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Childens, brought a firange prophecie to Anigonus, bidding him looke well to 40 him fel fe, and know, that if Sciencus did escape his hands, hee should recover Balylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie belieuers may give credit to this tale. Had it beene true, me thinkes, Anizonus rather should have hanged those Chaldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they fay that he did) after him, whome the destinies preserved for so great purposes.

When hee had fetled things at Babylon, he tooke his journie into Cilicia, where he wintred. There hee tooke vp ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yearely income to amount vnto cleauen thoufand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great civill Warre betweene ALEXANDERS
Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

The combination of PTOLOMIE, CASSANDER, and others, against ANTI-GONVS. Their demands and his answere.

His great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonius dreaded, enuied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomie, Caffander, and Lysimachus, had privily combined themsclues together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practifes hee had fome notice; the good entertainement giuen vnto Seleueus, giuing him fefficient caufe of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them feuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their love toward him, that would be readie to requite them with the like. The cold anfiveres which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie; it being likely that a good armic should prevaile more than a faire mellage. Therefore, as soone as the season of the yeare would permit, he tooke the way toward Syria, and was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victoric, obtained against Eumenes their common enemie, and the honor that he had therby gotten. In which 20 war, for a fruch as they being his Confederates must have endured great losse, with hazzard of their whole estates, if the contrarie faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voiage, wherin they had been all aduenturers. Wherefore they defired him, that making betweene them all an equall divition, of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing casie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best bee to every ones liking, if hee would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Helle bont, to Ly imachus; for wheras his own Dominions were fo much extended Eastward by his late victorie, he might well spare some of those westerne Proninces, 40 to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Prouided alwaies, that Seleneus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne, out of which he had beene driven so iniuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deep!y to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent vnto their demands, which otherwise they mutt labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, hee should yet bee able to redeeme peace when soeuer he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he fo weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of fuch b d friends, for feare only, least it should be taken from him perforce. Rato ther he hoped that he should be able to find them worke, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore, he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profits of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeede they had alreadie fufficiently gained by him, if they could fee it, having by his meanes kept their governments, where of they were like to be dispossed by Polysperchon, and the councell of estate in Macedon. But what meruaile was it, if they considered not how he had faued them, feeing one of them had forgotten the time, when coming to him as a fugitive, and begging fuccour, he was by his meere bountie relicued, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassader did not (faid he) in those daies command me to furrender Prouinces, and give him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers fake) defired me to pittie him, and help him against his enemics: which I did; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now prefumes to threaten me. As for Selencus, how can he complaine of wrong, that durit not flay to pleade his right? Idid vie him well, but his confeience told him that he lo had deferued ill: else he would not have fled. Let them that Io curiously search in to my doings, confider well their owne, which fome of them can hardly infufie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings; and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

Q. I I.
The preparations and beginnings of the Warres.

Hen the Embassadors were dismissed with this answere, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Intigonus perceiuing that he should bee 20 inuaded from Europe, as soone as hee were entred into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomie to guard the Sea-coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Alia: giving him also in charge, to drive out of Cappadocia fome that were alreadic fent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cypres, not unfurnished of monie, to draw friends to his fide, and raise vp troubles to his enemies. Especially he laboured to make himselfethe strongest by Sca; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreslowed his journie into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanes, which associated many excellent commodities for building of a Nauie. Therefore, having crected Beacons, and laid poll-horses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, 30 he inuaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to main-

Ptelomie lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their natural Lord : his other Prouinces hee kept with a few Garrifons, better feruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraine enemie. So Anigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Countrie, and beganne to let great numbers of Artificers on worke in making fhips, which was one of his most carnest cares. In these businesses hee consumed a yearcand three moneths; notidly. For he tooke Joppe, and G.zza, which were yeelded vnto his diferetion, and well vsed. The strong Citic of Tyrus held out long, 40 but was compelled in the end, by famine, to render it selfe vpon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomie was not afleepe, whileft thefe things were in doing, though he kept himselfe within the bounds of Agypt, as indeede it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to fland against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuerthelesse by Sea (where his enemie was as yet vnreadie) he fent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleneus had the chiefe command.

Seleners passed with an hundred faile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no litle discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which 50 was then gouerned by many pettic Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Piolamie; the rest were, by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Agyptian with sharpe scele.

The same commoditie of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called alfo Caifander, but not the fonne of Antipater, how focuer by the painefull and learned writer Remerus Reineceius, he is by some ouer-fight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomic, and his Confederates, and bufily employ in their quarrell all his forces, which hee had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby emoyed reft; but now hee threw himfelfe into dangerous warre, chooling rather to vndergoe trouble at hand, than to fall under certaine ruine, though fomewhat further distant. which would have ouer-whelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the reft.

ð. III.

Howeach partie fought to winne the afsiftance of Greece. ANTIGONVS his declaration Against Cassander. ALEXANDER the some of Polysperchonrenoiteth from ANTIGONVS, who had fet him up.

N the meane feafon all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vinto them the people of Greece, whose aide which way focuer it incined was of great importance. Herein at the first Anigomus sped so well by large estution of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedamonium, and other Pelopome fant, of whom he waged eight thou-fand, and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowse on himselfe againe, and taking upon him the title of Captaine of Peloponnesus, to make head against Caffander.

These bopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kinde. Wherefore to make Caffander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greekes and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, That Cassander had very cruelly slaine Olympias, mother to the great A'cvander; and not herewith contented, had thut vp in close prison the poore Ladie Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a delire to make himfelfe King ouer the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Ladie Theffalonics, Daughter to King Philip, a match 30 vnlit for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to loyne with him in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Princes, Fhilip, and Alexander, hee had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Cittie by him built, and called by his owne name Casandria; and had reedified the Citic of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander, For these reasons he erequired them to make a decree, that Castander should restore to absolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her sonne; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire (by which name sinigonus him seife was understood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece good, but for the neede which he had of their affiftance. These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not only the Greeks would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Caffander; but that the Rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing, but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfuil of all others to the Roiall bloud. But concerning his loyaltie to the yong Prince, the world was too wife to be deceived with vaine shewes. His undertaking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got casic beliefe, in regard of his prefent hatred to Caffander. Yet herein also Ptolomic strone to be as car-50 neft as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which affoorded men farre more feruiceable in warre, than were to be found in any

40 should be restored into freedome, this he did, not because he was carefull of their

Prouince of the Empire. And this indeed was the point, at which both fides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all fure, deceived himfeife, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon fine hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponne [165, whereby it might appeare, that on his fide was meant nothing elfe, than what was openly pretended. In Peloponnesus, Cascanders men had, with much bloud-shed, gricuously afflicted the contrarie faction; and he himselfe perceiuing, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what vse he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiuing that Alexander came furnished with plentie of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt fuch as might feeme best affured : hee thought it a good part of wifedome, to furrender vpon faire conditions, that which he could 10 not affure himselfe to hold any long time by force. Therefore, he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuerfie; letting him know, that Antigonus was very skilfull in fetting men together by the eares, not caring who prevailed, but only deliring to have them wearie themselues, whilest he was busied elswhere; that so at length he might finde oportunitie to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the flue hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponne us; it should be freely put into his hands by Caffander. Prouided, that hee should from thenceforth, renounce all confederacie made with Antigonius, and enter into a fure and faithfull league with Ptolomie, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. O- 20 therwife, hee might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrie which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in hafte be wonne by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, so stilling himselfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus fince the beginning of these wars: among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, ( which hee did not carrie verie fecret) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not slick to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and fubject vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he loft both it and his life toge- 20 ther, by treason of the Sicyonians; who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were foone after vanquilhed in battaile by Cratelipolis, Alexanders wife, a difcreet and valiant Ladie. Shee in reuenge of her husbands death crucified thirtie of the Citizens taken in fight; and having by feneritie taught them obedience, did afterwards containe her Armie in good order, and gouerned those places that shee held, with the love and commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

ð. IIII.

The Atolians rife against CASSANDER in favour of ANTIGONVS, and are beaten. A fleet and land-armie of ANTIGONVS, viterly defeated by PTOLOMIES Lieutenant. In what termes the warre flood at this time. ANTIGONVS drawes nearer to Greece.

NTIGONVS, when he found, that with fo much monie he had only bought an enemie, beganne to raife troubles to Ciffander and his other aduerfaries, in Greece, by ftirring vp the Atolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie the Ilands in the Greeke 50 Seas, by whose affistance he might bee the better able to deale with

Ptolomie, that greatly preuailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the fuccesse which he expected. The Atolians, a factious Nation, and alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but fo, that commonly their games equalled not their losses. Cassander wanne some of their owne Countrie; fortified the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glaudis, King of the Myrians, whom he vanquished in battaile, to for sake their side, and binde himfelte to beare no armes against Caffanders friends. On the other fide, as many pettie Hands were drawne to loyne with Antigonus:

fothe Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonia, paffing along the coast of Asiatoward Cyprus, with an Armie vnder conduct of Perslaus marching on the shore for mutuall allistance, was quite overthrowne by Ptolomies Nauic. Polyclysus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had beene fent into Peloponnefus against 13 Alexander, finding no needs of his feruice in that Countrie, because Alexander was come ouer to their fide, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these anigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprised. Hecrode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces hee placed in ambush, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken priloner, with many of his men, and many were flaine, making little reliftance. Theodatas the Admirall perceiuing this, made all haft to helpe his fellowes that were on Land; but whileft bee with all his Fleet were intenting only to that bolinesse, Polyelytus appeared at their backs, who as foone as he perceived their diforder, haftened about the Cape, and charging them behinde suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings 20 caused Antigonia to deale with Ptolomie about some composition. First, hee sent Emballadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie : fo the parlie was vaine:

Hitherto each part feemed to have indifferently fped in the Warre, and thereby to have equal cause of hope and feare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did sceme to make amends to Ptolomie for his losses in Syria. Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigorius did equall the Confederacie, made betweene the Lioiuns and him; as also those pettieskirmishes, that had beene in Alia the leffe, to Antigonus his advantage, were fufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduer fe to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in 30 those parts by the two Callanders. Contrariwife, Antigonus valued the loffe of his men, monie, and ships, no otherwifethan as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would eafily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territorie by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby hee had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomic his enemie, and strengthened the bodie of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceede as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want

That which most molested him was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the # leffe; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to seare, left the people, being tied vnto him by no bond of allegeance, might vpon small occalion result from him, to men of as honorable reputation as hee himfelfe. To preuent this, and to be nearer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be therein person, where his affaires did seeme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria, vnder his sonne Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twentie yeares old, he appointed many ancient Captaines as affiltants, or rather as Directors: the reft he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

HOW LYSIMACHUS and CASSANDER vanquished some enemies, raised against them by ANTIGONVS. The good successe of ANTIGONVS in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against CASSANDER.

He comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the processe of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had thort leifure to thinke vpon moletling him in A/ia: they themselves were held ouer hardly to their owne worke on amore that rebelled a-King of the Thracians, joyning with fome Townes that rebelled awere held ouer hardly to their owne worke on Europe fide. Seuthes a gainst Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scytbians into the quarrell. All these relied vpon Antigonius, who was to helpe them with monie, and other aide. The Ætolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, having Aacides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Ly (machus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselves. Hee sodainly presented himselfe before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne to their dutie. He fought a battaile with the Soythians, and wild Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrie. Finally, he ouer-came Senthes; and following the heat 20 of his victorie, flew Paulanias in battaile, whom Antigonia had fent over with an Armie, and all his men he did either put to ransome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Atolians. For he wasted their Countrie; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victoric, fought againe with their forces joyned in one, ouerthrowing them, and killing Lacides that vnfortunate King. Finally, hee draue the Ltolians out of most of their Countrie, and forced them to seeke their safetie among the wild Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he fent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his adversaries 20 with painefull trauaile; after which they remained only fauers. Antigonus himfelfe at faire leifure wanne all Caria the whileft, and fent Armies into Peloponne fus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing libertie vpon all the Cities he tooke out of Cal. fanders hands. The whole Countrie of Peloponne (us (excepting Sievon and Corinth) with the Ile of Eubea, and many places of the firme Land were by these meanes wonne to be his in true and vehement affection, readie to doe or fuffer any thing for him, that had made fo cuident a demonstration of his readinesse, to give them the libertie indeede, which others promifed in idle words. Many States desirous of the fame benefit, would faine have thewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wife to trust them look. Therefore Antigonius 40 made shew as if he would passe ouer into Macedon : by which terror he forced Casfunder to repaire thither in all hafte, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Townes of Greece to weakely guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselves, if any forraine succour appeared. The aide which they defired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Countrie; draue his Garrifons out of divers Cities; forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Theles, and let the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebeshad not long before beene raifed out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act hee was accused by Antigonus, as if it had beene 50 fome hainous crime. Yet now the fame Antigonus winneth the Citie, and the love of the Inhabitants, only by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainely they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpontheir miferable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

λ. V I.

Victories of PTOLOMIE by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which PTOLOMIE and SELEVEYS Wanne, against DEME-TRIVS the Sonne of ANTIGONYS.

253 the prelence general national factors in the to his affaires in the lower Afia, and Greece; to the delignes of his enemies, taking aduantage of his ablence, ruined the yery foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yeare preceding hee had ouertopped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wanered betweene contrarie affections, inclining one while to Antizonus, another while faintly regarding their couenant with Prolomie, was vilited by an Egyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne person, casily reduged them to a more settled order, putting fome to death, carrying others away priloners, and leating a Lieutenant of his own 20 appointment, Gouernour of the whole Countrie. With the same fleet he ranne alongh the Sea-coafts, walting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned loden to Cyprus. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonia, heating frequent reports of the miferies, wherewith his Fathers Subjects were oppressed, made all hast out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed foot with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did he tire him felfe and his followers, in hastic seeking of one, that by lanchingout into the deepe could in a few minutes delude the labour of fo many dayes, if neede had forequired. Answerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the fucceffe. For Ptolomie was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it cer-20 taine, whether having lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would returne vpon those maritime Countries; or make toward Syria, where his comming was expected. He was indeede gone into Agypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a royall Armie, which he leuied with all convenient speede, for the recoverie of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was faine to choole out of vacertainties the most likelyhood, and returne the way that hee came, with all his companies, which were fitter for feruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrifons among the Cilicians. Hee had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Spria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomies comming with a puissant Armie, to give him battaile. Hercupon he called to counfaile his principall friends, who admied to him to give way to the time, and expect some better oportunitie in the future : being a yong man, and weakely furnished with meanes to reful such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomie and Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceede from the cold temper of those aged menthat gaue it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to beethe fonne of Antigonius, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his owne title waightie enough to bee laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found hee much reason that should move him to diarust his forces, as infufficient. His men were better exercifed than the enemies, and promifed as much as could be required. Therefore perfuading himfelfe, that fuch ods 50 of number, and of great fame, would rather ferue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, hee resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the aduantage of more helpe. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome journic ouer the Deserts of

à. VII. How SELEVC VS recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries in the higher Alia. The ERA of the Kingdome of the Greekes, which beganne with this Dominion of SELEVEVS.

Hile Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperitie, Selences tooke leaue of him, and went up to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which hee found to fauourable, that recourring first his owne Prouince, hee became at length mailer of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Scleucus was very strange, and full of vnlikelihoods. His traine of no more then eight hundred foote, and two hundred horse, a number too small, to have beene placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into firong places, for him that alreadie stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylomans had found fo good a Gouernour, that none of them would finde courage to relift him; 20 but left that worke to Antigonus his owne men, withing them, ill to speede. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by casie compulsion they left off, and followednew Enlignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and fubmitted themselues joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for enery man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should iffue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemie, with more then a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismaied the rest, that 30 they did no more than feeke to make good one firong place, wherein were kept the Holtages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his securitie in those quarters. This Cattle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leifure, against dangers, that were nor then apparent. Seleucus quickly tooke it; and so got the entire possession of Melopotamia and Bibylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for desence of those Provinces, that were the vtmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like : for his owne great Armie lay betweene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza, had opened vnto Seleneus the way into those parts; he found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. 49 Hauing now gotten what he fought; it behoued him to feeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too small and his friends were ill able to lend himany more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, joyning vnto himfelfe, out of Perfix and other Countries, all needfull helpe, came with ten thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse, either to saue all from being lost, or to drive Seleueus out of that which he had wonne.

Against this power, Seleueus had only foure hundred horse, and somewhat aboue three thousand foot, wherewith to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations having yeelded him many louing subjects, but few souldiers. There-50 fore when his enemies were neare to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himfelfe from the place where his reliffance was expected, into certaine marilhes not farre off; where he lay fecretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that hee had beene fled, and was the leffe carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine fecuritie, his campe was taken by furprize, the first night of his arrivall;

Protomie and Seleucus isluing out of so rich a Prouince, as Agypt, came so well prouided of all necessaries, that their Armie felt not any great grieuance of the cuill way, when battaile was prefented them, which confidently they undertooke. In all things elfe they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were veterly unprouided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kinde of Palisado, fastened together with chaines, and sharpened in such manner, that the Elephants could not feeke to breake vponit, without receiuing much hurt. The rest of their forces, which (besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate feruices, by them performed that yeare, whilest the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine journies, or 15 long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetriss was embattisled. The right beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part ftriuing more to winne honour, than to fatisficany other passion, as basing little cause of hatred, or reuenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetriss, who vpon no necessitie would needes fight a battaile with disaduantage, beganne to appeare by his loffes. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, having more to loofe by her than he could get: but in this fight thee was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; vnlesse it may be said, that the terror brought vpon his men, by the loffe of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beatls were in that kind 20 of warre hardly to be relifted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were forcly hurt, and eueric one of them taken. This disafter caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiuing that all must lie vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they beganne to fhrinke, and many of them to prouide for their fafetic by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had strough so long in vaine to make his menabide, that hee himselfe was likely to be loft; he was faine to give place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as farre as to Azotus, which was about thirtie miles from the place of battaile. A great part 30 of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his companie turned aside, hoping to faue fuch goods, as in half they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the fireets with fumpter Horses, and cloied vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and letch, others, to carrie out what they had alreadic loden, Piolomies Armie brake in without relistance, taking them with their goods and the Citie al-

This victorie restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For betweene Gaza and Phanicia no place offered relistance. In Calelyria 40 and Phanicia, some townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given vp by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinic against their Captaine; who trufting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honorably entertained, in respect of his fidelitie.

the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with fundric of the Captaines, were flaine he himfelfe was driven to flee for his life into the Deferts; and the whole Armie yeelded vnto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victorie, drewall Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord. without any further stroke stricken.

This victorie of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greekes, an accompt much vied by the tewes, Chaldrans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first years of this Ara. The authoritie of that great Astrologer Ptolomie, from which, there is Ptol. A'more. Lit no appeale, makes it plaine, that the flue hundred and nineteenth yeare of NABONAS-12

s AR, was the fourescore and two years of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is L.Gauric, in an- needleffe, than that note of the learned GAVRIEVS, That the first of these regres notal ad beam mas reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four e hundred thirtie and cialit yeares after NABONASSAR. With the observation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (asit ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to have beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the fame yeare; which was from Nabonassar the fine hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeare; and the last of the hundred thirtie and seuenth Olympiad. These observations of the Celestiall bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcufable. As for fuch occurrences 20 in Historie, and the yeares of fucceeding Princes (that are not feldome ambiguous, by reason of vnremembred fractions) if they seeme to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthic of note; that these yeares of the Greekes. were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appeares in the difference of one yeare, that is found betweene actions, related by the feuerall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a yeares diffance.

d. VIII.

How PTOLOMIE lost all that he had wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed out the Macedonians, by those that had beene subtect unto the Persian Empire. Of divers pettie enterprizes, taken in hand by ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS, with ill successe.

N a happie houre did Seleucus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylan, with fo few men as his friend could then well spare : for had he staied longer 40 vpon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomie could have spared him none at all, Demetrius the fonne of Antigonus, having loft the battaile at Gaza, received from Ptolomie all his owne goods, his Pages, and Ser-

uants, in free gift, and there with all a curteous meffage, to this effect: That no perfonall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which hee and his Confederates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would feeke to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetries an earnest desire, of requiting him, with fome as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together 50 theremainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could bee spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts; and advertising his Father of his misfortune, befought him to fend a new fupply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour loft. Antigonus, vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had faid,

That the victorie which Ptalomie wanne vpon a beardleffe Boy, should bee taken from him by bearded men : yet vpon defire that his sonne, whom hee tenderly loued, should amend his owne reputation, He was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomie hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did neuertheleffe follow his owne butinesse in Catefyris; thinking it enough, to send part of his Armie under Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been alreadic vanquished, when their forces were entire. This peraduenture would have beene sufficient: had not Cilles too much undervalued the power of fuch an Enemie. Hee thought that this yong Gallant, hauing lately faued his life by flight, would now bee more carefull of to baying a faire way at his back, than adventurous in fetting further forward, then vrgent reason should prouoke him. In this considence he passed on without all fear; as one that were alreadie Master of the field, and should meete with none, that would iffue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this carelesse march; he tooke the lightest of his Armie, and made his journie with fuch diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the fuddaine, without any battaile, Mailer of his Campe: taking him aline, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repaire the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Greathad almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bountie of 20 Prolume, with equal fauor, in reftoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich prefents. But neither was Ptolomie so weakned by this losse, nor Demetrius fo emboldened by his victorie, that any matter of consequence therevpon enfued. For Demetrics feared the comming of Ptolomie; and therefore he fortified himfelfe in places of aduantage: Ptolomic on the other fide was loath to engage himselfe in an enterprise, wherein he might perceive, that if the comming of Antigonus found himentangled, he should either be driven to make a shamefull retrait, or a dangerous aduenture of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than alreadic he possessed.

Antigonias, indeede, was nothing flow in his way towards Syria; whither hee 30 made all halte, not fo much to relieue his fonne, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the yong man had so well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of agood Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victorie, he brought such forces, as might serue to re-conquer all Syras: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good foundation, laied by his tonne; whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of oreatest importance.

Prolomic had now leffe reason, to encounter with Antigonus, than before his comming to have affailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of confultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduised him to retire into Egypt; alleaging many good arguments, to that purpose: which they might well perceive to bee agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdice. s, in the like defensive warre, So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honor; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any fuddaine passion of seare: and he departed at faire leifure, not only carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrie that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pecces: fo easie was it in those times, for the Captaine of a strong Armie, to make himselfe Lord of a great 50 Prouince.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Bibylon, and many other Nations, (which the victoric of Alexander had ouer-runne, with to haffic a course, as gaue him not leifure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not only by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The hot contentions for Superioritic betweene the King of Ifsel, and those of Damafeus; betweene Ægypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nimue; the Perfians, and many Countres; argue a more manly temper, to have once beene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, soughtfor, wonne, lost, and againe recovered, by contentious Masters; as sifthey had no title to their owne heads, but were born: to follow the fortune of the Mascelonians. This will appeare the more strange, if wee shall consider, how the several States of Greese (many of which had never possible) did greedily embrace all occasions of libertie: and how these proud Conquerors were so glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather friends than servants, for searce of further inconvenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries, had alwaics beene subject vinto the rule of Kings, or pettic Lords, whom the Babylonans and Persans long tince had rooted out, & held them in such bödage, that sew of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had viterly taken from them all remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Persans Empire: so that wanting within themselues all soueraign power, or high authoritie, the life and spirit of cuery Estate; then lay as dead, and were becaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had beene members.

Why the Persian Satrapa, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, firincto lay hold yon those Provinces, which had many ages beene subject vnto them, and scarce source yeares in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conqueroor did cease to alfright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispessed them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherin, who is not satisfied, may finde no lesses the purchase of the Historic, than authoritic to construct it. For wee seldome reade, that any simall Kingdome, prevailing against a faire greater, bath made so entire a conquest, in the compasse of ten yeares, as lest vnto the vanquished no 30 hope of recourie, nor meanes to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather vtter constition hath ensured.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set downe by Macshianell; and concernes all other Kingdomes, that are subject vnto the like forme of Gouernement; the fumme whereof is this. Whereforeur the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of flaues; there is the conquest casie, and soone assured: Where ancient Nobilitie is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader should preuaile fo farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children ( for brethren hee 40 vseth not to suffer aliue) were taken or slaine; the whole Empire would quickly be wonne, and eafily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassaes, how great focuer they may feeme, are meere flaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personall regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, where in hope of private gaine, should not countervaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwife, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though hee further got the better part of the Countrie, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Roiall bloud, there are in the Kingdome store of great men; who are mightic in their feuerall Countries, and having certaine Roy- 50 alties and Principalities of their owne; are able to raise Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitie, will alwaies stirre vp and inflame them, so that vntill euery one peece were wonne, and enery one (an endlesse worke) of the chiefe Nobilitie, brought brought under or destroyed, the victorie were not compleat, nor well assured. It is true, that such power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader; to whom the discontenuments of a few can easily make a faire entrance. But such affiltants are not to eafily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to bee fatisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they foone returne to their old allegeance, vpon condition to keepe what they have, vnleffe they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to please one man, without offending another as good as himselfe. The Turke, on the other side, needes not to scare any perill, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principall men. The greatell mischiefe that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of fome frontier Towne, or the wiifull loffe of a battaile: which done, the I raitor hath foent his fting, and must either flie to the enemie, whereby he loofeth all that he formerly did hold, or elfe, in hope of doing fome further harme, he must aduenture to excuse himselfe vnto his Malter, who seldome forgives the Captaine, that hath not ftriuch by desperate valour, against mistortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so joyning themselves vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted; for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than fuch, as are subject vnio them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principal men, doth leave vnto them no meanes, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing effate of their Prince; fo would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him affitiance, if aduerlitic should make him stand in neede of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turkes Basaes provinciall Governours, that knowes either from whence he was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the loffe and veter ruine of the Turkif Empire, can loofe and foot of his proper inheritance, and it is the proper inheritance of the subject, which is also a Kingdome viito him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conqueror, who hath no other deutee painted on his Enfigne, than the picture of

As is the Tw kilb Empire, so was the Persan, voide of libertie in the Subjects, and vtrerly defiture of other Nobilitie, than luch as depended you mere faiour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall bloud, and others, descended from the Princes that joyned with Davius, the Sonne of Hystasses, in oppressing the Mags: these were men of reputation in Persas, but their reputation confined only in their Pedigree, and their safetie in not medling with affaires of State, which made them little effectmed. In what simall account these Persas Princes wereheld, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vucles, Cosen Germans, and Brethern, were called by the Kings, Their Slanes, and so did stile themselues, in speaking vntothese great Monarchs. That vpon cuery light occasion of displeady live they were handled as Slaues; it is easie to be discerned, in that example of cruelties, practifed by Nerwey vpon his owne brother Massis, which hath been somethy horse of in place more convenient. As so the Satrass, or Gouernours of the

cruelte, practifed by ***zees* you his owne brother ***Maffees**, which hath beene formerly noted, in place more conuenient. As for the **Sarapa**, or Gouernours of the Prounces*, it is needleffe to cite examples, prouing them to haue been meere flaues: it may fuffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Vomen and Funuches, by whom the King was gouerned. To this want of Nobilitie in **Perfa**, may be added the generall want of libertie, onuenient among the people: a matter no lefte auailcable, in making eafie and furethe conquelt of a Nation, then is the caufe affigned by Muchiauel. For as Affer people is Affer, did not care to runne from the enemies, because it was not possible, to that they should loade him with heauier burthens, than his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst wader their owne Princes, are not greatly searcful of a forraigne yoke; Nor will be hastic to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, then was that whereunto they had beene long accultomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes beare such faithfull affection, to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction in Lumbardie; for the Townes that they wanne, they wanne out of the hands of T yrannous oppressors : and this did cause the Matedonians, with other Nations, that had beene subject vnto the posteritie of Alexanders followers, to ferue the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were caled of many burthens, which had beene imposed upon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tamenesse, which we finde in those that had beene subjects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede beene absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: against whom Antigonia sent part of his Armie; thinking therewith to bring them vnder; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaine that hee fent fell vpon the Nabathaans, at fuch time as they were bulled in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrthe, Frankinsence, and other such commodities. All, or most of these rich wares, together with fine hundred talents of filuer, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon : for their comming was fuddaine, and vnexpected. But ere they could recouer Syria, 20 the Nabatheans ouer-tooke them, and finding them wearie with long marches, made fuch a flaughter, that of foure thousand foor, and fixe hundred horse, only fiftie horse escaped. To reuenge this losse, Lemetrius was set out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not refifted by any Armie, but by the naturall defence of a vast Wildernesse, lack of water, and of all things necessarie. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein heelost not much honor; for they craued it, and gaue him presents. Returning from the Nabatheans, hee viewed the Lake Asphaltites, whence he conceived hope of great profit that might be raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandrie of his fonne, Antigonus was well pleased; and appointed men to the worke: but they were flaine by the Ara- 20 bians, and so that hope vanished.

These pettic enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage against Ptolomie; when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the loffe of those great and wealthy Prouinces, a matter to be neglected; neither was it fase to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should have beene exposed, to the danger of ill affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with fifteene thousand foot and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing and his sonne did leffe. For Selencus was then in Media; 40 his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessitie of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without letting in Garrison more men than he could spare; neither did hee get much; and therefore was faine to fet out the brauerie of his expedition by burning and spoiling the Countrie; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemie, who thenceforth held it as his owne affured.

Intigonus had laid vpon his fonne a peremptorie commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an unfetled state of things, either the Warre might bee ended, by the furie of the first brunt; or else it would bee vaine to strive, against all difficulties to likely to arife, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that by length of time was like to become leffe terrible to the Enemic. Demetrius therefore, leaving behinde him five thousand foote, and a thousand horse, rather to make thew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himfelfe, with greater forces, could doe little more than nothing, forfooke the enterprife, and went back to his Father.

δ. IX.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the house of ALEXANDER was destroyed.

Hele ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselues with vnessectuall trauaile, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred but mecre Beildes that maine point, Of retayning the Provinces which every one held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a falfe colour, to the bufinefle: That the forme of ALEXANDER by ROXANE, Should be made King, when he came to full age : and, That all the Estates of Greece should be (ct at libertie. The advancement of yong A'exander to his Fathers Kingdome, feemes to have beene a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonius; in whom was discouered a purpose, to make himfelfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more nearly touched Caffans'er. For in his cultodie was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in fort anfwerable to their degree; but as close priloners, taken in that warren wherein they; had seene the old Queene Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to have put 30 them in possession of the Empire. The mutual hatred and feare betweene them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this conclution of peace, grew vp fatter than any time before, in the heart of Caffander: who faw the Micedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the fonne of their laterenowned King. All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince mult first haue possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander thould be reduced to his poore office, of Captaine over a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Aridaus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne firength. He in the meane time, by his readinesse to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himselfe from that ill-fauoured imputation, of feeking to make himfelfe Lord of all that

Alexander had gotten. The like aduantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greekes to their libertie-This libertie had hitherto beene the subject of much idle discourse ; but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held fearce any Towns of theirs; Caffander occupied most, of the Countrie which if he should Let free; he must be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the com-

them all in puissance, Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where every one mans helpe is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can fland out alone, when all the reft are wearie. The best was, that he knew all their affections; which tended to no such end as the becomming Subjects vnto any man; much leffe to the fonne of an Aflatique woman, of whom they had long fince refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a thort course, and caused both the Child and his Mother to be slaine: freeing thereby himfelfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yeelding vp his gonernement, which he must have done when the child had come to age. Rexame was a Ladie of fingular beautic, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdicents delired to have her fonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediately upon the death of alexanuer, she had vsed the fauour (if it were not love) of Perdiceas, to the fatisfying of her owne bloudie malice, vpon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius; whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wines is held no crime. For having by a counterfait letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Ladie into her hands, flied did, by affiltance of Perdiceas, murder her and her Sifter, and threw their bodies into a Well, caufing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were shee and her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time, as the neare approching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a 20 wearifome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of callanses, was not fo much detected in outward thew; a sinwardly it was pleating vnto all the reft of the Princes. For now they held themselues free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; tearing none other change of their cflates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein euery one perswaded himselfe of successes, that had worke enough at home) beganne to rowze themselues: as is flow the time were come, for each man to improve his owne stock. Antigonis his Lieutenants were busic in Pelogonnessa, and about Hellesson: while their Master was carefull in following other; and some greater matters that were more secretly go to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greeze; yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomie, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassaner. Ptolomic. complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in larved aling, to be feat a libertie. Vnder colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Citica; where he wan foure Townes, and some after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his Fremeirs.

After this, putting to Sea with a firong fleet, heranne along the coal of A/n, winning many places and in that voiage alured vato him a Nephew of Antigonal (agood Commander, but difcontented with the ill requitall of his feruices) whom 40 finding fhortly, as falle to himfelfe, as he had beene to his owne Vnele, he was faine to put to death. But in doing the fethings, his delire to fet the Gr.ekes at liberticappeared not fo plaine, as he wilhed that it floulds for their cafe was no way bettered, by his molelling Antigonus in A/n. Therefore to get the lone of that valiant Nation, He made at the laft an expedition into Greecie fellew where hauing fet free fome little Ilands, and landed in Pelaponne/uv, he raifed fo great an expectation, of finithing the ong defined worke, that Cratespolis, the Widow of Alexander, Polyfer class fonce, gaue vp into his hands the Townes of Sveyon and Corneth.

Prolomie had conceined a vaine beleefe, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and affiftance, would all of them take heart, and rife vp in armes: where 50 by with litle labour, their libertie might bee gotten; a not be bee acknowledged as Author of this immortall benefit. But long fernitude had well-neare extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recouer freedome, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in purfuit thereof; but sate idiely still, as wishing it to fall into their mouths.

The Lacedemontums, about these times, beganne to fortishe their Towne with walks, trushing no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that veheld it, were too much impaired) that had beene a wall to their Towne and Territorie.

The Albenium were become as humble feruants, as they had been, in times pail, infolent Mafters: creeting as many flatuaes in honor of Demetrius Phalerun, as there were dayes in their yeare. This Demetrius was now their Gouernour; and he gouerned them with much moderation: but in fpight of their hearts, as being Lt 0-10 uer them by Caffander. By this bafe temper of the principall Cities, it is caffe to gather, how the reft of the Countrie flood affected. Prolome could not get them, to their owne good, and to furnish them with the promifed fupplies, of monie and victualls. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thraldome; as judging the commoditie, that would arise by an exing them to his patite, a matter of more weight, than the losse that Caffander fhould receive thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigonus tooke the worke in hand. But when he tound fuch difficultie in the busin, the chaffe ged his purpose; and renewing his former friendship with Caffander, he retained Si-

Before the comming of Prolomic into Greece, Cassim ler had been cheld occupied with very much worke. For (belides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) he found meanes to allure vnto himfelle, the Lieutenanes of Antigonus, that were in Pelopomelus and about Italigions: making his owne advantage of their discontentments. By the like skillull practite, Hee freed himfelfe from a greater danger: and made those murders which he had committed seeme the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polyportons, that had made so great a fittre in the raigne of Arakaus, did after the death of Roxans and her Child, enter againe vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another sonne of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this yong Prince was Hercules: hee was begotten on Barfine, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had beene lesse eitcemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or elfe perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdicess, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother, had moved fuch compassion, and regard of his being Alexanders only living child, had procured vnto him fuch good will, that the demand which Polysperchon made in his behalfe, was deemed very just and honorable. There were indeede more hearts then hands, that joyned with this yong Prince : yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him, that least ought, had not beene most false. Cassander had raised an Armie, to 40 withstand his entrie into Macedon : but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he affaied Polysperchon himselfe, with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he prevailed so farre, that the old Vilaine was contented to murder his Pupill, chooling rather with many curses, and fowled ilhonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnes us and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a Noble same with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, wito both his dead and living Soucraignes.

Anticonus had notall this while beenera-fleeper, though his loffes were hitherto the chiefe witneffes, of his having beenera fitter in thefe commotions. He thought tenough for him at the prefent, to retaine his owner and therefore tooke order for 50 the recoverie of those places, which Piolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the refl, it no way grieved him, to fee Caffander incurre the generall hattred of men, by committing those murders, of which the profit was like to redound wnto him, that was the most powerfull; or to see Polysperchon and Ptolomie sweat, in a busic ware against Cashander. If they would have continued their quarrells, he could well have anoorded them leifure, and have thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perfuaded, that when the rest had wearied themselues in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtic conceipts, he demeaned him felfe among his followers; looking bigge vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that cauled so many of them, to reuolt from him, but it was no great loffe to bee for faken by those that looked with enuions eyes, voon that fortune, whereon their owne should have depended. Against this envie of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigones bullly fought a remedie, fuch as 10 was like to gue him a goodly title, to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Silter into the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes; whom he had a great defire to take to wife. This his defire was not without good hope:

for howfocuer finee discouered much willingnesse thereunto, yet was shee in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpose, to get her by compultine meanes: either because his fancie being an old man, was not ouer violent; or rather because his ambition, wherevnto all his affections had reference, could have made fmall vse of her, by doing fuch apparent wrong. Shee had beene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, after whole death shee came to her brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to finde a new 20 husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in loue with her, durst then aspire vnto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with prouiding her of an husband. Shee therefore, being a luftie widow, fuffered her bloud, so farre to premaile against her honour, that shee supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Parramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: faying, that shee was his fifter, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empire lay, in a manner, voide, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene : then did many seeke to obtaine her, while thee her felfe defired only a proper man, with whom thee might lead a merie 20 life. To this purpose did shee inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haste;

but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, thee had her choise of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomie, Lylimachus, and Casander, being all her carnest woocrs. All these ( Antigonus excepted) had wives alreadic, Ptolomie had many wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde.

This hindred not his fute: peraduenture it advanced it; by giving to cleopatra, fome hope of mutual tolleration. To him therefore thee bequeathed her felte, and was taking her journie from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citic, made her to flay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be knowne. Anti- 40

gonus had now a Woolfe by the cares; he neither could well hold her, nor durft let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; he had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had beene the way, by which he might have incurred a generall hatred, lafting perhaps beyond her life; as the courfe taken by Cassander against

Roxane (a Ladie leffe respected than Alexanders owne fifter) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wifest way, to procure her deaths for to let any other enjoy the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouernour of Sardes; willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as so mischieuous conspirers, against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murther was detected, we neede not aske; for seldome is that bloudic crime vnreuealed; and neuer fo ill smothered, as when great perfons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and A'exander the Great extinguilhed, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought vpon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods jultice, due vnto the crueltie, of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, vpon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were loone after cast downe, ouer-whelming themselues or their children, with the ruines, as the sequele will declare.

How DEMETRIVS, the some of ANTIGONVS, gauelibertieto Athens, expelling the Garrisons of CASSANDER out of those parts. The inmoderate honors decreed by the Athenians to ANTIGONVS and DENETRIVS.

One being left aline, that had any title to the Kingdome; it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superior, thould freely professe themselues Kings in name, as they were alreadigin subtance. Ver had this Kings in name, as they were alreadie in substance. Yet had this name ill bescemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did for beare it : neither seemed it convenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatnesse by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plaufible enterprise, even the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he inight get fuch honor as would not only drowneall bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of roialtie, whereof in feeming modestic, hee was not couctous. To this purpose, hee delivered a strong Armie, 30 with a Nauic of two hundred and fiftie faile, and fine thousand talents of timer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to beginne at Athens, and thence to proceede, in setting all the Countrie free. Demetrus came to Athens before he was expected : fo that without reliftance he entred the Hauen; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Caffanders good friend. had beene arrived. But when it was knowne, both who he was, and what was the causeof his comming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalereus forfooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vinder lafeconduct; only the Garrison in Munychia strone to make good that piece, which after a while was wonneypon them by force. During the fiege of Munychia, Deme-40 trius went to Megaras, whence he expelled the Garrison of Cajjander, and so reflored

I thinke it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than mecretrifles : for cuen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed sals by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselves, to the observance of generall commended rules, in lefferthings they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Ladie Cratesipolis lay in Patras, and had a great defire to fee Demetrius, hoping, belike, that the might, by his meanes, better her effate, and recouer her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Protomie (to whole Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his de-30 parture out of Greece, offered monie for the furrender of them. Yet the only buffneffe pretended was loue. He being aduertised hereof, left his forces in the Countrie of Megara, and taking a companie of his lightest armed, for guard of his perfon, made a long journic to meete with her. This troupe also, he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might fee her when shee came. As closely as the bulinesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonie; and bring him to any termes of reafon, by taking his deare some prisoner. Their project tell but a little thort of the effect. For they came to fuddainly upon him, that he had no better thift, than to muffle himselfe in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised; leaving them to ranfack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions; especially an extreme diffolutenesse in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industrie in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit; 10 excellent in deniting Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his owne hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For adversitie made his valour more active; prosperitie stupished him with an overweening, wherein he thought, that he might doe what he lifted. His fortune was as changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till shee had wound up the threed of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; he resolved no longer to attend the iffue of a fiege, to affaile Munjehia by force, that so hee might accomplish the libertie of Athens: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he refu- 10 fed to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified : yet by continuance of the affault, the multitude without, through helpe of their Engines that fcoured the walls, prenailed upon the refolution of those that lay within it, and wanne the place in two daies. The wails, and all the defences of that peece against the Citie, were leuelled with the ground and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was given their libertie, with promife to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victorie, gotten by Demetrius with greater-skill and industrie. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues; converting to bale flatterie, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors 20 had futed vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they confecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when hecentred their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of DEMETRIVS the a-lighter; they called them by the Names of the Godstheir Sautours, ordayning that every years, there should be chosen a Priest of these Gods; and further, that such as wereemploied by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadors, but Theors, or Consulters with the Gods; like as were they, whom they fent vnro the Oracle of Jupiter or Apollo.

It were a friuolous diligence, to rehearfe all their flatteries; these being so grosse. 40 Hereby they not only corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no vie. For he could not handfomly take upon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; unlesse hee would feeme to approve their vanitie, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was he fo tickled, with this their fine handling him, that when their Theodori, or Consulters, came shortly after, desiring him to relieue them with Corne, and Timber to build thips; he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weake is great power in relisting the assaults of flatterie.

ò. X I.

The great victorie of DEMETRIVS against PTOLOMIE in Cyprus. How An-TIGONVS and DEMETRIVS tooke vpon them the Stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

Rom this glorious worke, Antigoniu called away Demetrius, vnto a bulinelle of greater difficultie: meaning to imploy his feruice against protonic in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed, to establish a generall Counsaile, that should treat of matters, concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the fame time, Antigonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Imbros, committing their libertic entire, into the peoples hands: whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit anyother, to oppresse the Greekes, so would he be farte from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased friends: it followed, that he should concert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his

A pittifull Tragedie had lately hapned in Cyprus; through the indifcretion of Odenelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Ille. Nicocles, King of Pa-20 phos, was entred into some practise with Antizonus: yet not so farre that he thought himselfe past excuse; by which considence, he was perhaps, the more easily detefed. To cut off this negotiation, and the false hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was fent thither; who furrounding Nicoeles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to have him yeelded to the death. Nicocles offered to clear himselfe; but Menelaus told him, that die he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessitie, caused the vnhappie King, to rid himse se of lite and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that thee not only slew her selfe, but perswaded the wives of her husbands brethren, to doe the like. Also those brethren of Nicocles, vinto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the 30 fuddainenesse of this calamitie, did shut up the Palace, and setting it on fire, confumedit, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

What socuer the crime objected was; Nicocles perished as a manimocent, because he was not suffered to make his answere. Of this sad accident, though Menelaw described the blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet is it to bee thought, that much dislike feil also vpon Piolomie : as men that are grieued, cast an ill assection, euen vpon those, that gaue the farthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Prolomie was like to make. The Cypriois did litle or nothing agondt him : either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter 40 indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themseives haue the rule of their owne Countrie. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrifons, drew forth an Armie, and fought with Demetrius. But hee was beaten, and driven to faue himfelfe within the walls of Salamis; where he was fo hardly belieged, that without firong succour hee had no likelihood to make good the place, much leffe to retaine possession of the whole Iland. His greatest helpe at the prefent, was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could winne from him, nor good viage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercinaties: but all their goods were in Agrit, which was enough to 50 keepethem faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long, against the ods of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not hasted to the rescue.

Piolomie brought with him, a hundred and fortie Gallies, belides two hundred fhips of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This ficet made a terrible linew, when it was deleried a farre; though more than halfe of it, was whit for feruice, in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolome fent wito Demorrius, a threatning meffage: willing him to be gone, whelfie he would be ouer-whelmed with multitudes, & trampled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant, repaired him, with words of as much braueric, promiting to let him eleape, you condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Supon and Corinth.

Demetrial had no more then one hundred and eighteene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Protome; betters flored, with weapons fit for to that service; and very well firms the dwith Engines in the prowes; to beat vpon the Enemie. Neuerthelestle he stood in great doubt, of threescore Gallies, that lay in the Hauen of Salamis, leath Menelius with them should set vpon his back in which case, it was likely that all should go very ill with him. Agand this michiefe, hee bestowd ten of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelius from issuing forth, and setting his horse-men on the shore, to give what assistance they could, he with the rest of his feet, puts to Scangains Proconce.

I he fight begannearly in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull facceffe. The Generalls were not ranged oppoint on to the other 3 but held each of them the left wing of his owne face. Each of them prevailed against the fquadron 20 wherewith the encountred 3 but the fucceffe of Demetrius was to better purpofe. For his victorie in one part was fuch, as caufed others to fall out of order, and hinally draue all to betake thems fues wnto speedie flight. As for Ptolomic, he was faine to leaue his advantage vpon the enemic in one part of the light, that he might relieve and animate those of his sowne which needed him in another. Wherein hee found his losse over great, to be repaired, by contending any longer, against the fortune of that day; and therefore he laboured only to faue himselfe, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battaile, no vnufuall accident; yet was the victorie greater then could have beene expected. The occasions whereof were, partly the great 30 skill in Sea-feruces, which the Greekes and Phanulam, that were with I-meaning, had, aboue those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no lesse, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably judge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carying the strength of Ptolomies Armie, did not more encourage his owne menand terrise his enemies the day before the light; than breede in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the light, they fell oil, and stood about. For though it were fitting, that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossed with waine conceipts, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to thinke them selines abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Menelum issuing with his 40 sleet out of Salamis, thould charge the enemies in sterne, was veterly frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to barre ty the mount of the Hauen: which they manfully performed, as a real necessitie required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in fight; especially of the assailarlants: whereas on the contrarie, they that finde some part of their feares vaine, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceius an opinion of their owne abilitie to doe more than they had thought upon, out of their not suffering the harme that they had imagined.

Whatfocuer the causes of this victoric were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolomie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest 50 of his fleet was either taken or sunke. Neither did Menelans any longer striue against the violence of Fortune; but yeelded ypall that heeheld in Coprue, together with his Armie, consisting of twelue thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Hauen of Salamis. The same dejection of Spirit, was sound, in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served, the Ezprian by Land: none of them reposing any more considence in Prolomic, but willingly becomming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally beleeved, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the Isle of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expeflation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking cuery day a yeare, till he were aduertifed of the issue. In this moode Aristodemus found him, a notable flatterer, whom Demetrics had honoured, with the Meilage of these good newes. Ariflodemus had bethought himfelfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyfull errand: He caused his thips to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore, he himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he fent immediately back to the ship; and so all alone, he went forward, looking very fadly that no part of his tidings, might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arrivall (for it was knowne where he had beene) came prefently to Antigonus, who fent Messenger after Messenger, to meet him on the way, and bring speedie word how all went. But neither any answere, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be wonne from this demure Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and foftly forward, with a great throng at his heeles (that ferued well to fet out his Pageant) vntill he came in light of Antigonus; who could not containe himselfe, but went downg to meet him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Aristodemus, vpon the suddaine, with a high voice falute Antigonus by the name of King; vttering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pompe, as before he had couered it with silence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to Antigonies, and to his sonne Demetrius. Antigonus in requitall of the long suspence, wherein Ariflodemus had held him, said that it should also be long ere he received his reward. But the title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did fet on his 30 head, he could not wish a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and fent the like to his fonne.

When it was once noised abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselues Kings; it was not long, cre their fellowes were readic to follow the good example. Polamie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord flould be thought aman dejected, for the lotse of a fleet: therefore they saluted him also King. Lysmathw in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head, scleaus had, before this time, among the Barbarous people, taken ypon him as King: but now he vsed the stile indifferently, as well among the Greekes and Machanians, as in dealing with others. Only Casander held himselfe contented, with his owne harme: whereby howssourch the might shadow his pride, he no way lessent the same which he forester he will appear, when they shall enter ypon the Stage; whereon these old Tragidians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, beginner to play their parts, with bigger lookes, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes alreadie past.

Of the warres betweene the Kings of Ægypt, Mia, Macedon, Thrace, and others: untill all ALAXAN-DERS Princes were confumed.

The Expedition of ANTIGONYS against Egypt, with ill successe.

L the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, in imitation of Antigonus himfelfe, as befeeming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope, to fwallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne strength, hee resolued to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others; who should hardly be able to stand, 10 when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpole hee prepared an Armie of eighteene thouland foot, and eight thousand horse, with sourc-score and three Elephants: as likewife a fleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred thips of burden. The Land forces he commanded in person: of the Nauie Demetrin was Admirall.

When all was readic for the journie, the Sea-men adulfed him, to flay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the fetting of the Pleiades. But his haltic defire to preuent all preparations for relistance that Ptolomie should make, rejected this counsaile; imputing it rather to their feare than skill. Wherefore he departed from Antigonia 30 (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was foone changed into Seleucia, by his mortall Enemie) and came to Gaza; where hee met with his fleet. The nearer that he drew to Agypt, the more half hee made: thinking by celeritie to prevaile more then by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie ten daies prouision of victualls; and had many Camells loaden with all necessaries for passing the Deferts, ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Cassus, which is neare adjoyning to Nilus, he faw his fleet, riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many ships wanting. It had beene forely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were loft, others driven back to Gaza, or feattered elfewhere into fuch creeks as they 40 could recouer: Demetrius himfelfe, with the best and strongest vessells, did so long beat it up against the winde, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremitie, he and all his must have perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in fight, from whom these ouer-wearied, thirstie, and Sea beaten Souldiers received reliefe; After these painefull travailes there followed a Warre no leffe painefull than to little purpofe, for Ptolomie had fo fortified all the paffages vpon the River of Nilus, as he affured himfelfe either to end the warre there, or if his guards should happen to be forst, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakning of the Affailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertaine the Inuader vpon aduantage enough. All that Antigonus 50 fought was to come to blowes speedily, Ptolomie on the contrarie to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gaue him water enough, but wood hee had none to warme it, and while Antigonus affaulted the Rampiers raifed upon the River in

vaine, Ptolomie affaired the faith of his Souldiers with good fuccesse, for with great gifts, and greater promifes, he ferried them ouer fo fait, as had not Antigonus thruit fome affured Regiments, vpon the paffages next the enemie, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Egypt, ill

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their cleape, and those he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the fame ill fuccesse that Perdice as had formerly done, when he inuaded Agypt: had he not readily removed his Armie further off, from the noise of their entertainement, that had alreadic beene wonne from him. To preuent therefore as well the prefent danger of his flay, as the flame following a forst retrait, hee secretly practized the advice of his Councell, vpon whom the burden must bee laid of his entrance, and leaving

It is indeede lesse prejudicial in such like cases, that errours, dishonours, and loffes, be laid on Concellours and Captaines, than on Kings, on the Directed than on the Director, for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious. than that of a Vaffall; Charles the fift, as many other Princes have done, laid the loffe and dishonour he received in the invasion of France, by the way of Pronince, to Antonie de Lena, whither justly or no, I know not; but howfocuer all the Hino ftorians of that time agree, that the forrow therof cost that brane Captaine his life. Certainely to give any violent advice in doubtfull enterprises, is rather a testimonie of lone, than of wifedome, in the giver; for the ill fuccesse is alwaics cast your the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a falfe one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have sometime knowne it that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, have not only beene diffwaded, but held in a kinde by firong hand. from hazarding their owne persons, and yet have those kinde of Mutiners never beene called to a Marshalls Court.

> ø. I I. How the Citie of Rhodes was befieged by

His departure of Antigonus left behinde it many dead carkaffes, and a gereat deale of joy in £ gypt. Protomic tierd a rose tier. Lyfimschus, Meffengersabroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seieneus, Lyfimschus, great deale of joy in Agypt. Ptolomie held a folemne feast, and sent and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly incouraging all that side with the report of this his late selicitie, though it appeared but in a 40 defensive warre. Antigonus on the contrarie flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the joyes of his enemies for witnesses of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so litle things; his enemies being but bare sauers by the last bargaine, and himselfe, as he supposed, having lott but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retrait. How focuer it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another fathion, for that which he could not cleave a-funder by great blowes, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first. to fell the Tree it felfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, he refolued (leauing the great ones to grow a while) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates should be forst, either to relieue, 50 or to loofe, and hereby he doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouitions, promifed him victorie.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and having long held it felfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and thereby a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which. and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed ships, by which it not onely beat off all Pyrates and petric Theeues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their aliance and confederacie.

In this fo dangerous a time (in which they must eyther refuse all that fought them, and so stand friendlesse and a part, or joyne themselves to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Leyptian, both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnes, & neighbourhood was fearfull vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages, more apparent : gaue argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettic injuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other gricuances, while he made a more waightie preparation to purfue the warre against them openly and ftrongly. All things soone after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprife, he imployed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought such terrour vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their affiftance, and feruice against whomsoener. Demetrius, who knew from whence this charge came, and that the alteration was perfwaded by feare, and not by lone; raifed his demands to an intollerable height, re- 20 quiring a hundred Hostages to be deliuered him, and libertie to lodge in their Port as manie ships of warre as himselfe pleased: these conditions, more properly to be imposed upon a State alreadie conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a conftrained affiftance, reftored vnto the Rhodians their loft courage, and made them refolue to defend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchife all their able bond-men, and wifely rather to make them their fellow Cittizens, than to make them felues fellow flaues with them.

Demetrius having refused the faire conditions offered, and the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded them, makes preparation for a long fiege, and finding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of batte- 30 rie; in the invention and vie of which, he never showed himselfe a greater Aritism, then in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had fustained all the affaults given them for a whole yeare, after many brave fallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they indured within the Towne, which had proped farre more extreme if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relicued them, Demetrius by mediation of the Gracian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magithrates and officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the viual policie of warre, and flate: for while, with the flowre of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Caffander reco- 49 uered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him : neither did Callander make the warre as in former times, by practife and furprife, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which hee himselfeled as farre as into Attica, and there with greatly diffressed and indangered Athens it selfe. On the other fide (though with leffe fuccesse) did Polysperchon inuade Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Etolians to dispatch their Embassadours towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, then to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten, by fetting all Greece at libertic.

Demetrius was no fooner out of the Hand, then that the Rhodians crefted flatues ear in honour of Lysimachus, and Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most reliefe, they consulted the Oracle of Ingle ter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple

Temple of Hammon, gaue the same faireanswere for Ptolomie, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master, for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; fo was Ptolomie at this time Lord of the foile: and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, then that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigenus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of "Alexanders Captaines could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needes be called Gods.

ð. I I I.

HOW DEMETRIVS prevailed in Greece, CASSANDER delires peace of ANTIGONVS, and cannot obtainest. Great preparations of warre against ANTIGONVS.

EMETRIVS comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece, quickly draue Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chafed him beyond the straits of Thermopyla. Herein his reputation did much availe him; which was fo great, that fixe thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recourred in thort space all that Cassander held in those straights, and giving libertie vnto the people, hee bestowed vpon the Athenians those peeces, which had beene fortified against them, to block them vp. Then went he into Peloponne [us, where he found the like, or more easie successe: for hee fuddainly tooke Argos, Corinth, Sieron, and the most of the Countrie, bestowing libertie vpon fuch as needed it. The Towne of Siegon hee translated by consent of the Citizene, from the old feat into an other place; and called it after his owne name Demetrias. This done, he betooke himselfe to his pleasure: At the Isthmian games he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Captaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and A-20 lexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of jest, that any, saue himselfeor his Father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behaulour hee was so farre valike to a King, that in all the time of his leifure, he deserved none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readie as ever to devise new honours for him: among which they made one decree, that what soeuer King Demetrius should command, ought to bee held facred with the Gods, and just with Men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, leaft the warres should fall heavily upon him in Macedon, which to avoide, he to knew no better way then to make peace with his enemie betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadours; but had no better answere from Antigonus, then that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in foliciting his friends, both to affift him, and take heede to themselves; neither found hee them flow in apprehending the common Danger, for Lylimachus knew, that if once Cassander had lost Mucedon, Demetrius would foone be Mafter of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomie and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigonis were suffered to put himselse in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt forces they should all together set vpon the common to Enemic.

Hercof Antigonus had notice: but Corned all their preparations, faying, That hee would as easily scatter them, as a flock of Birds are driven away with a flone. With these conceipts hee pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name Aaaaa 2 that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully prouiding to set out some stately game and Pageants, in oftentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellespont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe ouer into Alia. while himselfe with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus paffing the Hellespont, beganne to make hot warre vpon the Subjects of Antigonus. getting some of the Cities in those parts, to joyne with him, by faire meanes: winning others by force, and wasting the Countrie round about.

To represse this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hastic journies, and came foone enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lysimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; keeping himfelfe the whileft from necessitie of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and Seleueus his preparations were too great to bee soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his journie: which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all haue come to nothing, had not Antigonyo beene fo froward, that hee refused to yeeld vnto any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neare with a mightie Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leifure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great 20 aide from Ptolomie, that was joyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obaied. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Callander, vpon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Armie for defence of the Countrie; and that his journie might bee without any such blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at libertie. Cassander was glad to bee so rid of an Enemie, that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwife then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred vnto Antigonus, 20 It sufficed, that for the present, every one found meanes to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances elsewhere, to the end that each might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controuersie in Asia.

ð. IIII.

How ANTICONVS was flaine in a great battaile at Ipfus, neare unto Ephefus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

ELEVEVS, with his Sonne Antiochus, joyning with Lyfimachus, com-pounded a great Armie, which was (all confidered) not inferiour to that of the Enemie. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Civill) they were rather vnanswerable, than equall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had beene reputed a King indeede, when the rest were held but V surpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brane Commander, having given proofe of his worth in many great feruices of all kinds, and inriched the Art of warre with many inventions, which euen his enemies, & particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had som- 50 times flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stollen away from him to faue his life, with yong Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journie; and Lysimachus, that had liued long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captaines under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthin enough, to receive any benefit that fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both lides, were for the most part hardie and well exercised: many of them having ferued vnder Alexander; though of those old Companies. the long space of two and twentie yeares had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections; the followers of Seleucus were callly perfivaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged vnto the Confederate Princes: whereas Antigonus his men could dif-12 cerne no other necessitie of righting, than the obitinate qualitie of their Lord, that needes would be Matter of all. ziningonus had about three-fcore and ten thousand foot, ten thouland horse, and three-leore and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were fixe thousand thort of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the ods of finehundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and a hundred and twentie armed Chariots of warre; which helps, though they little had availed the Perfrans, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpected greatnesse of his enemics forces, or prefaging little good like to enfue, grew very penfue, communing much in private with his fonne, whom he commended to the Armie as his Succes-20 for: whereas in former times he had neuer been fo jocund, as towards the houre of battaile, nor had been eaccustomed to make his sonne, or any other, priuie to his counfaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad luck, either foregoing the light, or afterwards denifed, I hold it needleffe to recount: Diana of Ephelus dwelt neare to the place of battaile, a bulle Goddeffe in many great fights, and therefore likely to have beene thrust into the fable, if any matter, nearly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to beleeue that these two so gallant Armies, contayning well neare all thestrength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable fight, being led by fuch worthie Commanders, and whom the iffue thereof did highly concerne. Yet 20 are few of the particulars recorded : an easie losse in regard of the much varietie, wherewith enery storic aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorable things in the bastaile, were thefe. Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vpon yong Antrochus; whom when hee had broken, and put to flight, hee was fo transported with the heat of his good successe, that he never gaue ouer his pursute, but left his Father naked, and lout thereby both him, and the victoric. For when Selenens perceived this advantage, he enterposed his Elephants, betweene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Artigonus: and with many troups of horse offering to breake vpon the enemies battaile, wherefocuer it lay most open, he did so terrifie the Antigomians, that a great part of them rather chose to renolt from their Lord, whillt they 40 were fairely inuited, than to fullaine the furie of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize, or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into flight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his deltinies. An igonus was then foure-fcore yeares old, very fat and vnweildie, fo that hee was vnapt for flight, if his high spirit could have entertained any thought thereof. Hee had about him fome of his most trustic followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceived a great troupe making towards his person, told him, Sir King, yonder companie meanes to charge you; he answered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon DEMETRIVS will releeve vs. Thus expecting, to the very laft. that his sonne should come to the rescue, he received so many Darts into his body, so as tooke away his lately ambitious, but then fearefull hopes, together with his troublesome life.

His great abilitie in matter of Armes, together with his infatiable defire of Empire, haue sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate Aaaaa 3

his fortune, but yied infolence towards all a like, as if it had been fome vertue nearest representing a Kingly Majestie. This was the cause that so many of his tollowers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie for fooke him in his last necessitie. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indeauours of their Vassalls, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest services: shall finde themselves upon the first change of fortune, (feeing it is love only that staies by adversitie) not only the most friendlesse, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This datigonus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified upon his fon.

How DEMETRIVS for faken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to Selevevs and Prolomie, beginning a new fortune, and fortly entring into new quarrells.

Or Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus, finding all quite loft, was glad to faue himfelfe, with foure thousand horle, and fine thou fand foot, by a speedy retrait vnto Ephelin, whence 20 he made great hafte toward's Athens, as to the place, that for his fake would fuffer any extremitie. But whileft he was in the middeft of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadours met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Citie. These were Embailadours, not Theori, or Confulters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miserie, with such a decree: neither did any part of his calamitic more afflict the vnfortunate Prince, than to see his aduersitie despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends. Yet was he faine to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauen, of which he now flood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, 30 that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall line to teach them their old language, and speake vnto them in another time. When he had gotten his ships he failed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrifons were enery where broken vp; the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Armic and Fleet, without monie or meanes wherewith to fultaine him and his followers any long time. All the rest or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieue, for to put himselfe into the field on that fide of the Sea, he had no power, and to inclose himfelfe in any of them, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to burie himselfe and his estate. Hee therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briers, fell vpon a corner of Lysimschus his Kingdome, whereof hee gaue all the spoile, that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses having beene too great to be repayed againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to bulle themfelues, in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victorie had made them Lords, wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being prefent and Mafler of the field, for neither Ptolomie, nor Caffander were at the overthrow given, having onely fent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which selencus led, who 50 tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise divided from his owne Territorie than by the Riuer of Euphraies. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands: because they did not expect to prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made only in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus, to make the best benefit that he could of the victorie, at which, neuerthelesse others did repine, and though they neither could nor durit accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet feeing the ouer-greatnesse of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they confulted vpon the same reason of thate as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorantof what they had determined, for he read it in the Law vniuerfall of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hercupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselues of all vnprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues being laid on the one fide, against their profits on the other, were found so farre too light, as Seleucus who had to day flaine Antigonus the father, and driven Demetrius the some out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his daughter, and fo by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The storic of this Stratonics, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Selencus fell to pathonately in love, and to diffempered, as Selencus his father, to fave his fonneslife gaue her (though the were his wife) vnto him, and how his paffion was discoucred by his pulse; is generally noted by all Writers. But neyther did this aliance betweene Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolomie and Lysimachus; betweene Demetrius and Cassander; betweene Demetrius and Ptolomie; though for the present it brought him againe into the rancke of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betweene Christian Kings have done in latter times, namely betweene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither haue the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull, then those of the same later times have beene; as in the stories of Charles the eighting of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples. Dukes of Millan, and others, the Reader may observe: betweene whom from the yeare of our Lord, One thousand, soure hundred, ninetic and five, when Charles the eighth undertook the Conquest of Xaples, to the yeare one thousand five hundred fiftic and eight, when Henrie the second died, the Histories of those times tell vs that all the bonds, eyther by the bed or by the booke, eyther by weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reape this profit by giving his daughter to his enemie Seleucus, that he recouered Cilicia from Plistarchus, the brother of Caffander; who had gotten it as his share in the division of Antigonius his possessions; for the Intruder was not strong enough toholde it by his proper forces from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would seleneus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he should have done against the common enemic. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Caffander; whither Phila, their fifter, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Caffunder, and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of aliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperitie, he never tooke notice to the others good. About the fame time he tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (pluralitie of wines being familiar with these Muce lonian; that had learned it in their Easterne conquests ) and so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, then strengthened with two friends, for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise then might seeme to advance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomie could both of them have beene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, should seeke his fortune som what farther 50 off than fettle his effate under their nofes. Particularly Seleneus thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe : and Ptolomie had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Ifle of Crprus. Now whether it were fo, that Sciences would faine baue fet his new father in law vpon the neck of Lyfinachus; or whether hee were indeede greedie of the bargaine, he offered to buy of Demetrius for readie monie, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hereunto Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keepe as much Land as hee could, having alreadie found in Cilicia twelve thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refufall fo displeased Seleneus, that in angrie termes hee demanded the Citic of The and siden, to bee furrendred vnto him; which were the only places in Spring that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. In flead of giving them vp. Demetrius tooke present order to have them better manned; and spake it stoutly. That were hee ouer-come a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Seleneus to become his fonne in law. In this quarrell Selencus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father-in-law for two Townes, from whom he had alreadie taken more then well hee knew how to gouerne. But the fire confumed it felfe in words, which had it fastned vpon armes. like it is that the weaker should have found friends, out of enuie to the sironger.

ò, V I.

How DEMETRIVS wanne the Citie of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but loft in Afia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of CASSANDER.

N the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vie the libertic, which Demerius had be flowed on them, were fallen by fedition, under the tyrannie of Lachares. Through which alteration their differenced Citie was fo weakned, that it feemed ill able to keepe of the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage hafte-

ned him, whom they had once called their God and Samour, to prefent himfelfe vnto them, in the habit of a reuenging turie. Hee brought against them all the force that he could wel spare from other emploiments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to give impediment to any bulinesse, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in athem had ill fuccesse; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he some repaired the losse; and (after fome victories in Peloponne lus, where hee wanne diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, wasted the Countrie of Acties, and cut off all reliefe from the Citie, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time : for it flood in a barren foile, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victualls; being also destitute of meanes to keepe fuch a Nauie, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomic, 49 who (trufting thereby to winne the love of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fiftie thips with corne, and fent them to releeve the hungrie Citie. But these hundred and fiftic were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting flips, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore hafted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come fo neare, that they might be discried. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the famine was fo extreme, that a Father and his Sonne did fight for a dead Moufe, which dropped downe betweene them from the housetop. Wherefore they sent Embasfadours to yeeld up the Towne, and craue pardon, having so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. 50 Yet were they faine to abolish this decree : rather because they knew not what else to doe, then because they hoped to be forgiuen.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victoric, did not only forbeare to take away the lives of these vnthankefull men; which they had submitted vnto his mercie; but out of his liberalitie gaue them foode, and placed in Office among ft them fuch as were most acceptable to the people. Neuerthelesse hee was growne wifer then to trust them so farre as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, and difpose of them at his pleasure; he was readie to lay hold vpon the word, and icaue a fore Garrison within their walls, to keepe them honest perforce. After this he went into Pelaponne (us, vanquished the Lacedamonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibilitie to take their citie: when the dangerous news called him in all haste, of Lyjinachus and Ptolomie, that prevailed fafter vpon him elsewhere, than himselfe to didypon his enemies in Greece. Lyfimachus had wonne many Townes in Afra, Plolomichad gotten all the Ifte of Cyprus, except the Citic of Salamis, wherin Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were straightly be fieged. Whilest he was bethinking himfelfe which way to turne his forces, a notable peece of businesse offered it felfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cafinder was lately dead in Macedon, and foone after him, Philip his eldeft fonne, whose two yonger bretheren, Antipater and Alexander, fought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell Theff slonics the Daughter of King Philip, whom Caff ander had married, feemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder fonne: who thereupon grew fo enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse of of this fact gaue a faire luftre to Alexanders cause: drawing the generalitie of the Macedens to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queenes death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose Daughter he had matried; that Alexander could not hope to make his partie good without fomeforraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soone appeare, in the following Tragedie, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had beene one that shifted well for himselfe, at such time as every man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. Hee was cunning in practize, and a good Souldier : one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely 20 killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memorie of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, vpon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditarie quarrell, deriued from his Father, whom shee could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by crueltie, that shee vsed against his friends, both alive and dead, as it made him adnenture vpon shedding the Royall bloud; wherewith, when once hee had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose lives hindred his purpole, argues him to have beene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: fuch crueltie being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a-farre off the dan-40 gers, that may quietly passe away : and seekes to avoide them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it selfe safe enough, untill there be nothing left, that carrieslikelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxaneit may bee faid, that they had well deserved the bloudie end which ouer-tooke them; yet ill beseemed it Cassander to doetheoffice of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men deserued, to die for the tyranie of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the divine Iustice brought fwords upon his wife and children, that well reuenged the crueltie of this bloudie man, by destroying his whole house, as he had done his Masters.

of PYRRHVS and his doings in Adacedon. The death of CASSANDERS children.

DENETRIVS gets the Kingdome of Macedon; prevailes in warre againft the Greeks;

Loofeth reputation in his warre againft PYRR HVS, and in his Civill Governement, and preparest win Afia. How all confipre againft DENETRIVS,

PYRRHVS and LYSINACHYS invade him, his drowe yeelds to PYRRHVS, who flavors the Kingdome of Macedon with LYSINACHYS.

YRRH VS, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince Lacides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a fue king Infant, from the furie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fold here's had conneighed him to Glaucius, King of illyrius, the deadly hatted of Cussular would haue bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that heerestored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelve yeares of age. Within the compasse of fixe yeares, either the indiferetions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went hee to De. 20 metrius (who maried his fifter) became his Page; followed him a while in his wars; was with him in the great battaile of 19fus, whence hee fled with him to Ephefus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomic. In &. gypt he fo behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife; fo that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon fent home, with monie and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptelomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recoucred the Kingdome of Epirus, and was fetled in it, then fell out that businesse betweene the children of Casander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that 20 hee had no desire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an hassie agreement, and divided the Kingdome with his yonger brother Alexander; who likewife felt the aide of Pyrrhus fo troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in fuch another helper. For Pyrrbus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Countrie, as the reward of his paines: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition : but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was fent for, and made a toole, to come fo farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a friuolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Deme- 40 trius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this overdiligent friend, by murdering him vpon some advantage. Thus Demetrus reported the storie, and it might bee true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wises, believed it not. But the issue was, that Mexander himselfe was feasted and saine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; excuting the fact to well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Caffander had been, that all the Ascedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was bulied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby hee was compelled to feeke peace of 50 Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to bee given vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargaine Antipater gricuously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed; untill his Father in law, to faue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his troublefome life. Thus in hafte, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to auoide moleitation, were flaine the children of Caffander: of Caffander that had flaine his owne Mafters children, in a wife courfe of policie, with carefull meditation (fo much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to creet his owne house, that fell downe you his graue, ere the cart ho nit was throughly setled.

It might be thought, that such an accesse of Dominion, added much to the greatneffe of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmitie; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of civill Gouernement: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the vse and fruit of Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King litted. Hee gaue himselfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those that offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing justice. He hath more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxurie his nature. By long rest (as fixe yeares raigne is long to him, that knowes not how to raigne one yeare) he discoucred so much of his worst condition, as made both the people wearie of his idlenesse; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost, though more especially; by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honor, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This affoorded him the better leifure, of making warre in Greece: where no he vanquished the Thebans, and wonne their Citie twice in short space, but vsed his victorie with mercie. Against Lysimachus he would faine haue done somewhat (the peace betweene them not with standing) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this journey purchased nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse euent. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon; which hee had indeede as honeftly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Theffalle; but there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough to ouer-runne his enemics Countrie, with two 20 great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have knowneraw Nouices in that facultie, wherein themselues are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generalls, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he missed that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which he ouerthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his prinate valour, shewed in fingle combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of bodie, challenged this yong Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The loffe of this battaile did not fo much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant be-40 haujour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the liucly figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (fand they) none, faue Pyrrhus, is like him indeed, in performing the office of a Captaine.

The ferumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dissilike of their owne. King; whom they began to discreteme, no so much in regard of his vnprositable journey into Epirus (for he had wasted nuch of the Countrie, and brought home his Armic in good case) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intollerable. His apparell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not 20 only too sumptuous and new fangled, but very vnmanly; and serving chiefly to be adaily witnesse, how much hee contemmed them and their good opinion. Ot his Souldiers liues he was rechesse: and suffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to scape out of his mouth. That the mare of them slied, the search was to pay. Hee made a mockerie of justice; and (as it were, to publish vnto all his Subjects, how little he effeemed it or them) having by a finew of popularitie inuited Petitioners. and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, heeled the poore futers after him in greathope, till comming to a bridge, he threw all their writings into the River; pleasing himselfe, in that he could so easily and so boldly deluce the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Purhus gathered audacitie, and inuading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrus lay then fick in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had fuch great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to torsake his winnings and be

At length he beganne to have some sceling of the generall hate; which to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to invade Alia, with a Royall Armie: wherein the fortune of one battaile might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, hee first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so hee might leaue all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mightie Armie, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelve thoufand horse: with a Nauie of fine hundred faile, wherein were many thips, farreexceeding the greatnesse of any that had beene seene before; yet so swift and vsefull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleneus and Ptolomie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Ly/imachus and Pyrrhus, to joyne against this ambitious sonne of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to themall, than ever was his Father. It was eafily differened, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Alia, there could be no fecuritie for his friends in Europe, what league focuer were of old concluded. Therefore they refolued to beginne with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lylimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armic: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhea. The matter was not oner great; were it not, that mindes prepared with 20 long discontent, are readie to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the camp was in vp-rore : some wept, others raged, sew or none did forbeare to vtter seditious words, and many defired leave of Demetrits, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to have gone to Lylimachus. When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Armie, he thought it the wifest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lyfimachus their owne Countrieman, against Pyrrhus that was a stranger: hoping by victoric against the Epirot, to recouer the love of his followers, in fuch fort that hee might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisedome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hastic as he, to meet with Pyrrbus; not intending to hurt him, but longing 49 to fee that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armor, and other tokens whereby he might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his crest. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ranne over into Pyrrhus his campe: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get fight of Pyrrhus, they would all falute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and prefented himfelfe bareheaded in view of the camp, whither fome were fent before to prepare his welcom. The newes of his arrivall found a generall applause, and every one began to looke 50 out, with defire to fet eye on him. His face was not fo well knowne as his helmet; therefore he was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their feruice; neither were there any, that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the mon moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and shift for

himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attiring himselfe poorly, did fearefully steale away out of his owne Campe : deserving well this calamitie, whether it were fo, that he would not hearken to the good counfaile of his friends. or whether his behaulour depriued him of fuch friends, as would dare to let him heate the vnpleafant found of necessarie truth.

CHAP. 6. S.8. of the Historie of the World.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entrie, into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lyfmachus came vpon him, very vnfeafonably, and would needs have halfe: faying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason tochallenge his part of the gaines. The bargaine was quickly made, and the divi-12 fion agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, voon better oportunitie.

VIII.

How DEMETRIVS gathering forces, enterprifed many things with ill fuccceffe, in Greece and Afia. How he was driven upon SELEVCVS, and comvelled to yeeld himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

hehad soone gotten an Armie; though Phila his wife (who is highly commended for a wife and vertuous Ladie) did poilon her selfe, vpon desperate griefe of his misfortune. The first, vpon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Atheniand, that had well deferued it. Hee beganne to lay fiege to their Towne : but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they made their spokesman; and taking 20 faire words instead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asa, with cleuen thousand Souldiers, meaning to tric his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile you him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines, that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies, and treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathoeles, the sonne of Lysimschus, came vpon him, with an Armie fo firong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stock against it. Wherefore, he resolved, to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a 40 Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuously impeached by Agathoeles: who pursued him ciose, and cut off all his prouisions, driving him to take which waies he could, without following his intended courfe. In many skirmillies, Demetrius vanquillied this trouble some enemic: neuertheleffe, hee could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titularie King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the River Lyous, so many of Demetrius his men were loft, that the rest could no longer make resistance : but were driven to travaile with fuch speede, as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, peftilent difeafes following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into 50 Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece : yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrie, but with vehement and humble letters he befought his sonne in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pitic him in his great miserie. These letters, at the first wrought wel with Seleucis, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himfelfe, when he recourred strength after the battaile at the (we, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Armie.

Many treaties were held betweene them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore, meere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man; and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sicknesse tooke and held him fortic dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ranne to the enemie. This not with standing hee still held out, and once had like to haue taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming been discouered by fugitiues, that gaue the alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had for faken him, and left him, with a few of his friends, to thift for himfelfe: hee was compelled, 10 by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few for sooke him) to yeeld

Selevers hearing this, was exceeding glad, and fent him very comfortable meffages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was fuch, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence: though otherwise he vsed him with as much fauour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a demic-iland, wherein were goodly walks. Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked roially, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his libertie was reserved vnto the comming of yong Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this 20 fort he spent three yeares, living merrily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happinesse, which with so much trauaile and bloud shed, hee had sought in vaine) and then died, leaving to his sonne Anigonus, the same which his father had left vnto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Co rinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will fhew it felfe hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Prolomie, of Lysimachus, and of Selevcus, that was last of ALEXANDERS Captaines : with other

Bout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomie King of Agypt; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (which in thole times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. Hee bad, by many Wiues and Concebiuses, many children: out of whom he felected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and cauled him to raigne together with himselfe, two or three yeares before he died, that so hee might confirme him 40 in the inheritance of the Kingdome. Atthis, Ptolomic Ceraumis (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captaines left; Seleucus and Lysmachus. These two needes would fight for it, who should be the longest liner of that brane Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, their neare equalitic of firength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was, the murders which Lysmachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathodes his eldest sonne: whose wife and children sled vnto Selencus for aide.

The Macedons, after seuen Moneths pause, having spent their first heat of admi- 50 ration, beganne to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Countrie man, that they for sooke Pyrrhus, vpon none other ground than because hee was an Alien-This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, what they lightly gaue him. Lyamachus had raigned about five yeares alone, when the Citie of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by events, to have foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne icalousie, and the instigation of a mother in law, caused him to poifon his Sonne Agathocles, which drew vpon him that warre, wherein (after the loffe of all his fifteene children, that were taken away by divers accidents)

CHAP. 7. S.I. of the Historie of the World.

Seleuciss was encountred by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie, that he was the last of all the great Heroes which had followed Alexander. For now he feemed to himselfe, as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his daies, and within feuen moneths followed Ly/machus, and other of his fellowes, by a bloudie death; being treacherously staine by Ptolomie Cersunw, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Scuentie and seuen yeare old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seventie and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had seene the daies as ir were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equal to any of them, in the Art of warre : cuen Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spake before; that is now readic to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than and Mexander himselfe euer did encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a storic more important, than any likely to enfue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes, that were held by Alexanders Succeffors, with leffe (and ftill decreafing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

CHAP. VII. The growth of Rome: and setling of the Easterne Kingdomes.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominion in Italie, from the death of TVLLVS HOSTILIVS, unto fuch time as they were affailed by PYRRHVS.

Ow Rome was founded by Romulus; setled in good order by Nama Pompilius; and by many, though small, victories, it gathered strength; vnto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the raigne of Tullus Hostilius: it hath beene alreadie noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse, beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it selfe out of Italie, to ouer-whelme the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (asin like cases I have done) briefly to fet downe the growth of this mightie Citie, in a compendious relation, of those many actions, which could not have beene delinered in the ages, wherein they were feuerally performed, without much interruption of the Historie, that was then occupied in matter more important.

Bbbbb 2

After the death of Tullus Hostilius ( who when hee had raigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Aneus Martius, Grandchild to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much vnlike him in disposition, fucceeded in the Kingdome of Rome. He walled the Citie about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which he enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybris, and the Citient Ostra vpon the Sea, fixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, having raigned four and twentie yeares, he died, and by his last will hee left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypfelus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinij, by the name of which Towne hee was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that Citic in Hetrivia 10. comming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tanaquils prophecie, he grew a fanourite of Ancus Martius; by his Gracian wit humoring the factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his decease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Gouernour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horse-men: neither was he lesse eminent in warre, than in peace: for he prevailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall, When this Lucius Tarquinius had raigned eight and thirtie yeares, he was flaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaguilhis wife, perceiuing what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, 20 that her Husband was wounded, and ficke, but not dangeroufly. And withall fignified vnto them, that in the interim of his licknesse, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophecied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculanus and Ocrisia, a well descended, but captive woman) brought vp in her house, and husband vnto her daughter, should supplie her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his recouerie: which gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the King- 30 dome in as good fort, as if it had beene a private household. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious : and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priseus, Sextus and Aruus, which had beene committed to his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oile, to fire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed fonne; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle, in mariage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it happened; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joyned in marriage: who soone concurring, and calling the Senate together, beganne to lay claime to the Kingdome. Vpon this tumult, Servius Tullius hasting to the Senate, 40 (where he thought by authoritie to have bridled insolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home fore bruifed, was flaine by the way, when he had raigned fortie and foure yeares. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to driuchis Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising crucltic without justice, and tyrannic without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; having tired himfelfe and them at home, vsed the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Oericulum, Suessa Pometia, and the Gabij. The iffue of belieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heate of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tar- 50 quinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for fo vnchafte a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne bloud; so (having first bequeathed the reuenge vnto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine, and Iunius Brutus)

The killed her selte: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tanquinus Superbus, with his wise and children, was deposed and bansshed; and fled to Forseman Sung of Hetrura for succour, in the sine and twentieth yeare of his raigne, and the two hundred fortie and sourch from the building of their Cities in which space Rome had scarce gotten full possession of fifteene m.les round about her.

Junius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his countrey from that heavie yoake of bondage, inforced the people by folemne oath, neuer to admit any government by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ranfacked their Kings goods, confecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their cares, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetuall to anuall, and from a lingle governour to a double; left perpetuall or lole dominion might be fome motive to vsurpation; and in stead of Kings they called them Confuls, lignifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwayes mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard setling of troubled waters, that the people after this innovation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their owne securitie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to religne vp his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie no would be hereditarie, and supposing that the very name and affinity with the house of Tarquin, favoured alreadie of their condition. In his roome was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gratious in the peoples eyes, gaue libertie, in matters of controuerfie, to appeale from the Confuls to the people: and that he might as well in goods as in person, auoyde occasion of suspicion caused his owne house to be pulled downe, because it was built in a place defensible, as it it had beene a Citadell. Neyther was Brutus any waves deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples fafetie, as their fauour: for having got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne fonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to reflore the banished Kings; 30 he caused them, publikely in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpartially to the blocke.

Hitherto the Romanes, having by the vnblemished integritie of Brutus, well appeaded all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imploy their militarie designements, against Forrainers; first, for their libertie; secondly, for inlarging of their possessing their possessing their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome situated as it were in the mid-way between Latum and the Hustin, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, cannot but give occasion of offence to her neighbours; wntill by maine opposition, having prevailed against her borders, shee vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine 40 therest.

Their first warre, in the first yeare of Confuls, was against Porfenna King of Hetwis, who being ouer-perswaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him againe in his Kingdome.

In the first consist, *Lievatius Coeles*, having long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge over Tibris ; at length feeling him/elle too faint to stand against fo many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the River, like a hunted Stagge, refressed his hote spirits, and returned safe to his fellowes, with the like resolution to give a new charge. Person 30, 34 lithough by this he had well-nigh won the hill *Laniculum*, which is the vericentrance vnto the Citic and sound the victoric, in a manner, assured by its owner; yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of *Assurus Secuela* (who having by errour slaine Persema his Secretarie, instead of the King himselfe, didin scorne of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) hee thought it not Bbbbb 2 any whit prejudiciall, either to his safetie, or credit, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his spleene, was not quite abated. though Aruns his sonne, and Brutus his enemie, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they loft Brutus, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion hee was, for their chastitie, not for beautie, mourned the losse of him one whole yeare. Into his place, for the residue of his yeare, was subrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Puluillus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to striue against the streame, and spent the residue of his time; which was about source to teene yeares, prinately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law, Mamilius Tusculanus, flomaching a freih at those old repulses, because Porsenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied further succour vnto the Tarquines, mustered up his Latines, and gane battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce. and the iffue vncertaine, vntill Aulus Posthumius, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracie greater than Confulls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Ensignes amidst the Enemie; and Cossus or Spurius Cassius (master of the Horse-men, an affistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recouer agains their Enfignes. This fight was fo well 20 performed, that a report went current, of Caster and Pellux, two Gods, who came on milke-white Steeds, to be eye witnesses of their valour, and fellow helpers of their victorie; for the Generall confectated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroade, reflected vpon themselves at home, and the fixteenth yeare after the Kings expulsion, vpon infligation of some desperate banckrouts, thinking themselues wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consulls, they made an vprogrein the holy Mount;

untill by Meuenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate:

with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they 20 might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controuersies, the Confuls authoritie notwithstanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement amongst themselves, they had continuall Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Amongst these, the Volsei and Aqui held them longest;

who made warre, of themselues, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Ci-

tie in their whole jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the sirname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as deriued from a great victorie: although, by reason of the pourrie of the Towne, a Roman Generall, in after times, would have been ashamed of that title. But yet 40 these graces had beene no occasion of disparagement, had hee not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduifed to fell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people : whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, and after judgement, banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsi, whom lately before he had vanquilhed, incenfed them to renew their forces agains, which being committed vnto him and to Attins Tullus, he prevailed in field, so farre forth, that hee was come within foure or fine miles of the Citie. Incamping there hee made fo sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Countrie, that hee would not relent, by any supplications of Embassadours, vntill his Mother Feturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves bet- 50 ter Subjects to their Countrie, than friends to their fonne and hufband, were more auaileable to Rome, then was any force of armes. Hercupon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after put to death among the Volsei, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others furmise) living with them vntill old age, hee died natu-

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Kemans; against whom the Fabil, three hundred and fixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained. that they only might be imploied, as it had been in a private quarrell. These Fabil, after some good services, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumvented and ali flaine: one only of that whole house, had beene left, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquished Hannibal.

In processe of time, the Komans were also troubled with the Volsa, at the hill Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minucius their Confull, with his whole Armic, had beene discomfitted, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus chosen Dictator, and to taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countrie in the space of sixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Vol/cian warre it was, that Appins Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before chosen Gouernours of the State, and inactors of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Confuls, and all other Magistracies) would have raushed Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captaine of a Companie, and lying then in campe at Algidum. Hereupon the people, in an vproare, tooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to refigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Confuls.

After this, either new quarrells, or defire to reuenge old loffes, drew the Romans into a new warre, against the Veientes, and their adherents, ypon whom having tried their forces, with diverlitie of Captaines, and varietie of event, they vanquillied the Falisti, and the Fidenates, and veterly subdued the Veientes. In conquering the Falifei, Furius Camillus shewed no lesse integritie than fortitude. For when a Schoolemafter, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all vp as Hostages: Camellus deliuered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him back into the Citie; which forth with yeelded vnto him in reverence of his justice. The fiege of Vey was ten yeares, and fo troublefome, that the Romans were there first 20 enforced to winter abroade under beafts skinnes (to which they were the more eafilvinduced, because then first they received pay) and to make vowes never to returne without victoric.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got fo large spoiles, that they confecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius : and the whole people in generall, were called to the ranfacking of the Citie. But yet they were no leffe vnthankefull to Camillus for his feruice, than before they had beene to Coriolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequalitie in dividing the spoiles: yet he requited their vnkindnesse with a new peece of service, against the furie of the Gaules: who being a populous Countrie, and very healthfull, the fathers (as fometimes 40 now) lived folong, that the fonnes, destitute of meanes, were enforced to roave abroad, feeking some place, where to fet up their rest: and withall being a Nation vast in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rouers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italie, set vpon Clusium, a Towne in Hetruria; whereof Rome having information (and being carefull of her Confederate Townes) fent Embassadours, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprifes. But the barbarous people, not regarding the meffage, vpon some injurie offered by the Roman Embassadours, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow to the Romans, by the River Allia, vpon the fixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for vn-30 luckie, and called Allienlis in the Roman Kalendar) they haftened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leaving the citie; fome creeping into holes; Priefts hiding their reliques; and enery one shifting for himselfe, ere the enemie came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestal Virgins, in this tumult, were fafely conuaied away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering boldneile out of desperate seare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did feate themselves in Thrones, in their severall houses, houre, ly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had lived, in State, The yonger fort, which M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gaules were entred the Citie, who feeing all quiet, at first suspected fome ambulh; afterward finding all fecure, they fell to the spoile, committing all to the fire and fword. As for the old Senators, that fate in their Majestie, with a graue resolution: having first reverenced them as Gods, anon they tryed whether they would die like men. When the Citie was throughly rifled, they attempted to the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of seven Moneths. Once they were like to have furprifed it by night, but being discried by the gagling of Geel. M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gaules being wearie, and the Romans hungrie. The bargaine was, that the Gastes should take a thousand pound waight in gold, to defilt from their fiege. Whilest the gold, was in waighing, the Gaules, with open insolencie. made their waights too heavie: Brennus, their Captaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, faying, that the vanquilhed must be epatient perforce. But in the midft of this cavilling, came Furiss Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banilhment) and fell vpon the Gaules, 20 with such violence, that hee dispersed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with their bloud, forcing them to restore the spoiles with advantage, and forbeare the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene so nice. Further, having vid the Citie of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gau'es, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corninus (each of which in fingle fight, flew a Champion of the Gaules) abated their prefumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service. was afterwards accompted a fecond Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their Citie, were earnestly bent to goe to the Veij to inhabite; but Camillus diffwaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veij, they changed their goucrnement from Confulls to militarie Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeares, was by civill diffension interrupted : so that one while Consulls ruled : another while there was an Anarchie : Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled againe, till after many yeares expired, the Confular authoritie was established; it being enacted, that one of the Consulls should alwaies bee a Plebeian. This was after the building of the Citie, three hundred fixtie fine yeares. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her 40 Minoritie, dares fet forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: fituated betweene Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly inuade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselues subjects to Rome, and vndergoe any conditions of Tribute or what else what socuer to obtaine protection, which the Romans, although both Countries had beene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should deuour the leffe, cafily allowed off; especially aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the aboundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capus it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The Families of the Papyrij and Fabij were most employed in the managing of 50 this warre, which indured the space of fiftie yeares. And in this scason were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumius were Consulls, and discomfitted by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominic : and when Q. Fabius Gurges loft the field with three thousand men.

But for these losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Sammites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) beganne to flirre. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributarie to Rome.

In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce betweene the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equal freedome in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, to that they required to have 10 one of the Confulls yearely chosen out of them.

This demand, of the Latines, was not vareasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Collonic; besides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any fuch capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betweene them ; wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Confulls.

Minlius Torquatus, and the older Decius, were then Confulls, whom the Soothfavers aduertifed, that the fide should be victorious, which lost the General in fight. Hereupon, Decime the Confull, exposed his life to the Enemie, and purchased victorie (as was beleeued) by his death. In which kinde of deuoting himfelfe for his Ar-20 mie, the sonne of this Decius, being after Confull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrarian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decil, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enimies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of fuch a religion, as required the lines of fo worthie Citizens, to be facrificed for their Countrie. The discipline of Manlius was no lefferesolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbad any one to for fake his place, and fight fingle with an enemie. For breach of which order, he caused his owne sonne to be put to death, who had slaine a Captaine of the Latines, being challenged, in fingle fight.

When the Latines, the Equi, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, 20 with some other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines aduentured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Confull, wasting all their Countrie with fire and sword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians, that made trial of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselues as Mediatours, betweene the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptorie denunciation of warre, vnto that partie, which should dare to refuse the peace by them tendred. These threats. which discourred their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Sam-40 miles were veterly fubdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained, that certaine ships of theirs were robbed; and sent Embaffadours vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadours, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Appulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites. and other Subjects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their owne weaknesse. Whereforethey agreed to fend for Pyrrhus, by whole aide (being a Gracian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should bee 50 confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which alreadie, in a manner it did ouer-spread.

ð. I I.

How PTRRHYS warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

Y RRH VS, for faken by the Macedoniam, and vnable to deale with Lylimachus, was compelled a while to liue in reit: which he abhorred no leffe than a wifer Prince would have desired. He had aftrong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnsetted clate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreated to the power of Lyfmachus, that it was no point of wifedome, to make an offensiue warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigenus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corints, at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his sathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. Vpon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that hee might serve to give some hinderance to Lyfmachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous defire of finding it, the Tarentine Embaffadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing none other aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themsclues under his protection. They had in their companie, some of the Sammites, 20 Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised, in behalfe of their severall Nations, as much as could be defired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victoric open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is faid, that once he answered Cyneas his chiefe Counsailour, asking what he meant to doe after every of the victories which hee hoped to get : that, having wonne Rome, he would soone be Master of all Italie; that, after Italie he would quickly get the Isle of Sicil; that, out of Sicil hee would passe over into Africk, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrie; and being strengthned with the force of all these Provinces, hee would be too hard, for any of those, 30 that were now fo proud and troublesome. But cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all : Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would line merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then to'd him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neuertheleffe, this Italian expedition fremed vnto Pyrrhus, a matter of fuch confequence, as was not to bee omitted, in regard of any Icholathicall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armieçofalmoft thrite thousand men, well forted, and well trained Souldiers: part of which he fent ouer before him vnder Cyneas, with the refit he followed in person. At his comming, he found the Tarentines very prompt 40 of tongue, but in matter of execution, ytterly careless to promide for the Warre. Wherefore he was faine to shut by their Theater, and other places of pleasure and refort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a shrick muster, as was to them very vnpleasing, though greatly behoouing to their chate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Lauinus the Roman Conful drew near, and beganne to wast Lucania, a Prouince confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readic to defend their owne Countrie; the Samnites were careleffe of the harme, that fell not (as yet) you them feliues; the Tureniums were better prepared than they would have beene, but their valour was little: all yo of the fell and beene accustomed to thrinke, for feare of the Roman forticude: and therefore it fell outhappily, that Pyrrhus relied more you his owne forces, than the issue of their vanuing promises. Here was now driven, either to fet forward, with those that himselse had brought into Malie, and the affishance of the Tareniums, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sufficiencie, which by all meanes he was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been scattered by soule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resoluted to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom hee proudly marched.

Lamms the Confull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great King, but came on confidently to meet him, and giue him battaile, ere all his addisents thould be readic to joyne with him. This boldnefle of the Ramm, and the flacknefle of the Chefflepann, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger moit to concerned, cauled Pyrrhus to offer a treatie of peace: requiring to haue the quarrel, betweene the Romans and his Italian fitneds, referred to his arbitrement. Whether hed did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arriue at his Campe; or whether, confidering better at neare diffance, the weight of the built-nefle, which he had taken in hand, be were delirous to quite twith his honour; the floor answere, that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Ramans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen hum their ladge, nor feared him their enemics.

Hercupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the R iuer of Stria: Leainto intending to fight, before the arrivall of the Samnites; Pyrthus, to hinder him from 20 palling that R iuer, vntill his owne Armie were full. Vpon the first view of the Komun Campe, it was readily conceiued by Pyrthus, that he had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to stera throng Corpt degrade, whon the passage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, vntill he saw his best advantage. But he quickly sound, that this new enemie was not only skilfull in the Art of warre, but couragious in execution. For the Komun Armie entred the Foord, in sace of his Corpts e.g. and; and their horse, at the same time, beganne to passe the River; in sundring places: which caused the Greekes to for sake the defence of their banke, and speedily re ire vnto their Campe.

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith he thought it best to profentthem, ere their whole Armie had recoursed firme footing, and were in store. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged upon the Romans: who floutly received him, as men well exercised in suflaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the dutie of a carefull Generall; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behooved him indeede to doe his best; for he neuer met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was flaine vnder him : afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the vse of his Kings armour, which was torne from 40 his back. This accident had almost lost him the battaile: but he perceiuing it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and tooke from the Romans their vaine joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his fide, as long as only speare and sword were vsed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose vnusuall forme and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (vnaccustomed to the like) were not able to fustaine, then was the victoric quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceining their horse put to rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themsclues both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of these strange beasts; gaue way to necessitie, and faued themselues, as well as they 50 could, by haltic fight: in which confternation, they were so forgetfull of their difcipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it;

kauing both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhas.

The fame of this victoric was foone forcad ouer Halic 2; and the reputation was no leffe than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to bee heard, that a Reman Confull.

Confull, with a select Armie, should loose in plaine battaile, not only the field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely wonne by Pyrrhus, for that hee had with him none of his Italian friends, faue the vnwariike Tarenines. Neither could be well dissemble his content that he tooke, in having the glorie of this action peculiarly his owne, at fuch time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for comming (as we say) a day atter the faire. Neuertheleffe, he wifely confidered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore, he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose hee sent vnto them Cyneas his Embassadour; to demaunding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himselfeac-cepted as their especiall friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberall gifts, labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their defire of recouring their cap-tiues, or their danger, by the riling of many States in Italie against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appins Claudius, an old and blinde

Senator, did stirre them up to make good their honour by warre. So they returned answere, that whilest Pyrrhus aboade in Italie, they would come to no agreement and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great defire of confederacie, with that gallant

Citic. Hereupon many kinde Offices passed betweene them: but still when hee vrged his motion of peace, the answere was, He must first depart out of Italie, and then

In the meane season, each part made prouision for warre; the Romans leauving

a more mightic armic than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthned with accesse vnto his forces, of all the East parts of Italie. So they came to triall of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boilferous violence of the Elephants, gaue to Pyrrhus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so joy-ctorie would be his vtter vndoing. For hee had lost the flower of his Armie in this battaile, and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor faw any likelihood of preuailing against them, that were like to be relieued with daily supplies, whilest he should bee driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants should alwayes stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soone teach the Romans, that were apt Scholers in such learning, how to make them unseruiceable. Where-forche desired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour safe out of Italie; which to doe (seeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting anie faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a flight occasion, presented by 40

Hen Ptolomic Ceraunus had traiterously murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized upon all the Dominions of Lygmachus in Europe, as it they had been ethe due reward, unto him, that had slaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysmachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Aucaclan any man of strength and reputation enough, to aduance himselfe against Cerannus. The friends of Lyimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as hee prosselfed) reunged their Lords death, than any way offended with the odious fires of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that wpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Cerannus sperswading themselves that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had beene wickee. These to assert in the same with the same with the same of Lemetrius, that made an attempt you the Kingdome. As for Anticolous, the sone of Seleucus, he was fare oil, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armienearevnto Europe. Yet hee made great shew of meaning to

able to bring an Armie neare vino Europe. Yet hee made great flew of meaning to reuenge his tathers death: but being flronger in monie than in armes, liee was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murtherer. While thefe three flroue about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made who of their diffention: threating warter, or promifing his affiliance, to cuery one of them. By the femenes he flrengthred himfelfe, and greatly aduantaged his Indian voiage, which hee had then in hand: requesting monie of a Chinebus, thips of Autrepans, and fouldiers of Prolomic, who gaue him his daugh-

30 Annicons, imps or Annizonus, and rounders or Frotomer, wrogate frim its daugneter in marriage, and lent him a firong power of Alecedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (couenanting to haue them reflored at two yeares end) more fer feare than for louenthat fo he might free himfelfe from trouble, & quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolomie grew mightic on the fuddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he increased.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the fitting Citie of Coffinichia, was held by Arfone his filter, the widow of Lyfimachus, who lay therein with her yong children. Her hee circumuented by making loue to her, and (according to the fairfion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of consanguinitie) taking her to wise, 49 with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he slew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good fucceffe, which his vilanic found, vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furic of a Nation, that hee had neuer heard off. Belgius a Captaine of the Guides, having forced his paffinge through many Countries, vnto the confines of Macedon, ent a proud mediage to Cerumus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwife, to looke for all the miferies of warre. These Guides were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrie, to fecke new seates, in that great expectition, wherein Bremus took and burnt the Citic of Rome. They had divided themselves, at their fetting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell

39 you Hales, the other palling through the Countries that lie on the Northerne fide of the Adriatick Sea, made long aboade in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeeme peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Gerannus to doe, who whole borders they came, about an hundred and eight yeares after fuch time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

When their Embailadours came to Ptolomie, asking what he would give: His answere was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it must bee with condition, that they should put into his hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld up their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor give any credit to their words. At this answere, when it was returned, the Gaples did laugh; faying, that they would foone confute with deeds, the vanitie of fuch proud words. It may feeme strange, that he, who had given away part of his Armic vnto Pyriba, for very feare; should bee so confident in undertaking more mightic enemies. The King of the Dardanians offered to lend him twentie thousand men against the Gamles; but hee scorned the offer; saying, that hee had the children of those, 10 which under the conduct of alexander, had fubdued all the East. Thus hee iffued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victorie must needes have followed the reputation of a great name. But he soone found his great errour, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equall in strength of body, and fierceneffe of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie. Ptolomie himselfe grieuously wonnded, fell into their hands, whileft the battaile continued; and they prefently flrooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with fuch desperation, that 20 the people fled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrie as loft. Only Softhenes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which hee many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from vling the victorie at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was content with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe seldome come alone) the good successe of Belgiw, drew into Macedon Brennus, another Captaine of the Gaules, with an hundred and fiftie thousand foot, and fifteene thousand horse; against which mightie Armie, when Softhenes with his weake troups made oppolition, he was casily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their walls, lea- 20 uing all their Countrie to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Micedonians destitute of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in leffe then fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who fought to discouer and subdue vnknowne Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia, had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very feafonably had these newes beene carried to Pyrrhu: in Italie, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romans; had not other tidings out of Sial diffracted him, and carried him away in purfute of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathoeles, who raigned over the whole Iland, the Carihaginians fent an Armie to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had beene expelled. This 10 Armie did fo fast prevaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to avoide flaveric, than in submitting themselucs to the rule of Pyrrbus; whom, being a Gracian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to line under the well knowne heavie yoake of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agr. gentines, principall Effates of the Ifle, fent Embaffadours, carnefly defiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieued Pyrrhu exceedingly, that two fuch notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so valuekily, both at one time. Yet whether hee thought the bulineffe of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he beleeved (as came after to paffe) that his advantage, vpon Macedon, 50 would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leifure, ouer into Sicil he transported his Armie, leaving the Tarentimes to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as hee found them, but with a Garrison in their Towne, to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; fo were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well ordered, or note worthic. The Armie which he caried into that Ifle, confifted of thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse : with which, soone after his descent in Sicil, he forc't the Carthaginians. out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also wonne the strong Citic of Errx, and having beaten the Mamertines in battaile, hee beganne to change condition, and turne I yrant. For he draue Softratus (to whom his crueltie was suspect) out of the Iland, and put Thenon of Syracuje to death, being jealous of his greatnesse: which two persons had faithfully served him, and delivered the great and rich Citie of Syracufe into his bands. After this, his fortunes declined to fait, as hee ferned himselfe, and salued the dif-reputation of his leaving Sicil, by an 1 mbaffage sent him from the Tarentines, and Sammites, imploring his present helpe against the Romans , who fince his leaving Italie, had well neare dispossed them of all that

Taking this faire occasion, hee imbarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie it seite, by eighteene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recoursed Tarenium, hee fought a third battaile with the Romans, 20 led by M. Curius, who was victorious ouer him, and forc't him out of Italie, into his owne Evirus.

A Prince he was farre more valiant than constant, and had he beene but a Generall of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had been directed to have conquered any one Countrie or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would have purchased no lesse honour, than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Captaine, or a valianter man, bath beene no where found Butheneuer staid vpon any enterprise; which was, indeede, the disease hee had. whereof not long after he died in Argos.

How ANTIGONVS, the Conne of DEMETRIVS, delivered Macedon from the Gaules. How PYRRHVS wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from

As

He vertue of Softhenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts againit Brennus: the Macedomans were no leffeglad to fubmit themselves vnto the government of Anigonus. than they had formerly beene delirous, to free themselues, from the impotent rule of his father Demetri w. His comming into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nauie, and treasure, beforming a King, did rather breede good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for hee was driven to vie against the Burbarians, only those forces, which he brought with him, having none other than good withes of the Micedons, to take his part. Biennie, with the maine firength of his Armie, was gone to spoile the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behinde him, that he thought necessarie to guaro the borders of M. cedon, and Pannonia; which were about fifteene thouland toot, and three thouland horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of 50 their fellowes : and therefore lent vnto Antigonus, offering to fell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, hee had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Anisgonia was viwilling to weaken his reputation, by condescending to their proud demands: yet he judged it vnsit to exasperat their furious choler, by vncurteous words or vlage, as Ceraunus had ouer-fondly done. Wherfore he entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous manner, with a roiall feast: wherein he exposed to their view, such aboundance of masse gold and siluer, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with fight of the vesfells, wherein it was ferued. He thought hereby, to make them understand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if neede required, to wage a mightie Armie.

To which end, he likewife did shew vnto them, his Camp and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this brauerie ferued only to kindle their greedie appetites, who feeing his ships heavie loaden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified, himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferiour vnto the Gaules: thought all time loft, wherein they fuffered the prefent poffessors, 12 to spend the riches, which they accompted affuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoile and purchase: which tale, caried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his camp, where they expected a greater bootie, than the victorie over Ceraunus had given to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and fuddaine; yet not fo fuddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it: who distrusting the courage of his owne men, dislodged fomewhat before their arrivall, and conucighed himselfe, with his whole armic and carriage, into certaine woods adjoyning, where he lay close.

The Gaules, finding his Camp for faken, were not hastic to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the emptie Cabbines of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was 20 either loft or hidden. At length, when they had fearched enery place in vaine, angric at their lost labour, they marched with all speede toward the Sca-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilest hee was busie in getting his men and carriages a ship-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were so careleffe of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoile of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonia, where he lay in couert, and had faued it felfe by getting aboard the fleet:in which number were fome well experienced men of warre, who discouring the much advantage offered vnto them, by the desperate 20 prefumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manlie hold vpon the oportunitie. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Marriners, landing together, with great refolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the difordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great flaughter, driven to cast themselves into the seruice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victorie, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and reliftlesse oppressors of so many Countries, were overthrowne.

To speake more of the Gaules, in this place; and to shew how, about these times, 40 three Tribes of them passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, shall give better occasion, to rehearfe these matters briefly.

Howfoeuer the good fuccesse of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victoric, could not thereupon be perswaded, to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better, than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as 50 yet, he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood vpon hard termes, had sent unto Antigones for helpe : not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he sure to get, either a supply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, vnder colour of making his word good, in feeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in branerie, meere necessitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practife.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and fine hundred horse: an armie too little to be imploied, by his restlesse nature, in any action of importance; vet greater than he had meanes to keepe in pay. Therefore he fell vpon Macedon: intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigones compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thoufand of Antigonus his Souldiers, revolted vnto Pyrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such faire beginnings, eafily perfwaded the 12 courage of this daring Prince, to fet vpon Antigonis himselfe, and to hazard his fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonis had no defire to fight, with this hot warriour; but thought it the wifest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrie, For Pyrrhus ouertooke him in a straight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength: a manifest proofe that he was in retrait. The Gamles very brauely sustayned Pyribus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were flaine) after a sharpe fight : wherein it seemes, that Antigonus keeping his Macedoman Phalanx within the streight, and not advancing to their succour, tooke away 20 their courage, by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken foone after; who, finding themselves exposed to the same violence, that had confumed fo many of the Gaules, yeelded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort: which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Wherethe Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreame difficultie (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seene so much. that they had no defire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discoursed so well their affections, that hee adventured to draw neare in person, and exhort them to yeeld. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. 20 All forfooke Antigenus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled a long with him to The falonica; where he had fome small forces left, and monie enough to entertaine agreater power, had he knowne where to leavie it. But while it he was thinking, how to allure a fufficient number of the Gaules into his feruice; whereby hee might repaire his loffe: Ptolomie, the fonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and eafily defeating his weake forces, draue him to flie from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroade into the world, and made himfelfe a King.

This good successe remined the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all forrow, of his late mil-fortunes in the Roman warre: fo that he fent for his sonne He-40 lenss (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselues.

How PYRRHVS affailed Sparta without successo. His enterprise vpon Argos, and his death.

YAKH VS had now conceived a great hope, that nothing should bee able to withfland him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gaules, beaten Antigenus, and wonnethe Kingdome of Meredan There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that A'ex-ander had wonne, any Leader of fuch name and worth, as deferred to be fet up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might doe what he pleafed. He raifed therefore an Armic, confifting of fine and twentie thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentie Elephants; pretending warreagainst Antigonus, and the giving libertie to those Townes in Pelaponne/us, which the fame Antigonus held in Subjection; though it was easily discoursed, that such great preparations were made, for accomplithment of some designe more important. than warre against a Prince alreadic vanquilhed, and almost etterly dejected. Especially the Lacedamonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleanymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himfelfe to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promifed to restore him to his Kingdome. This promife was made in fecret; neither would Pyrrhu make thew 10 of any displeasure, that he bare vnto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to have two of his owne yonger fonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours hee deluded men, euen till he entred vpon Laconia; where prefently be demeaned himfelfe as an open enemie: excusing himselfe, and his former diffembling words, with a jeast; That he followed herein the Lacedamonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedamonians, to deale in like fort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppresse: but now they complained of that, as fallehood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practifed as wildome, till it made them diffrufled, for faken, and almost contemptible. Neuerthelesse, they were not wanting to 20 themselves, in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; cauling such as could beare armes, to reserve themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhis had vinwisely deferred, vpon assurance of prenailing.

Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, other wife than with armed Citizens: foone after this (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part hard to approch) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with walls; at the prefent, only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance feemed most easie. Three daies together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding siercely, and no leffe floutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved 20 the Towne the first day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the fecond day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of fauing the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though alreadie they had torne in funder the barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta, with a good firength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had beene helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrie stood, vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a defire to preuaile against all impediments. But the third daies worke showed, how great his errour had beene, in forbearing to assault 40 the Towns at his first comming. For he was so mantully repelled, that hee saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course, he had no desire to spend his time.

Antigenus had now railed an Armie, though not firong enough to meet theenemie in plaine field, yet able to hinderall his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being duers ly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his sirst attempt. Whiles hee was thus perplexed, letters came from drgo, inuiting him thicher; with promise, to deliuer that Citic into his hands.

Civill diffension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of seueral salison, to call in Pyrrhus and Antigomus; but the comming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous, to rid their hands of such powerfull Assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselse to be. Antigomus told the Argines, that he came to saue them from the tyrannic of Pyrrhus; and that hee would be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrrhu would needes perfwade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus, offering in like manner, to depart, if they so desired.

The Argues tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickins from his enemie: and therefore prayed them both, to diuert their powers some other way. Hercunto Antigenus readily condefeeded, and gaue Hostages to assure his word: for he was the weaker, and stood in neede of good-will. But Pyrthu thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would give none, to his inferious; especially, meaning deceipt. This made them suspected his purpose to be such, as, indeede, it was. Yet he lesser garded their opinions, than to hold them worthie of assurance, by giving such a bond, as hee intended to breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citie should be opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argus: which was accordingly performed. So his Armic, without any turnult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Cate. The taking off, and setting on againe, of those Towers, with the troublethereto belonging, did born give alarme to the Citie, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully Master it. Argus was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gaules (that had the Vantgarde) being ignorant of the waies, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of curry by-passegrand setting wpon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great bosses.

Pyrhus therefore, understanding by the confused noise, and unequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in diltresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assurance of the place. But the darknesses, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, untill breake of day. Then beganne heto make his passage by force, and so farre prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a to work the said of the said

Thus ended the refliesse ambition of P, rrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Mucedon to Mitgonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enemie. The bodie of Pyrrhus, had honourable funerall, and was given by Ansigonus vito Helenus his sonne; which yong Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epyrus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus, held the Kingdome of Mucedon; the possessed for the principle of Selection, raigned outer Asia and Syria; and the house of Protomic had quiet 50 possessed from the Asia of the control of Sent five lowing all vp, digested these, among other Countries, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

CHAP. I. Of the first Punicke Warre.

A discussion of that probleme of LIVIE; Whether the Romans could haue relifted the great ALEXANDER. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equal valour to

HAT question handled by LIVIE, Whether the great ALEXANDER could have prevailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them , hath beene, and is, the subject of much dispute; which (as it feemes to me) the arguments on both sides do not so well explane, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus bath given, of the Roman power, in his daies. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibals judgement) inferior to slevander, though to none elfe, could with fmall ftrength of men, and little store of monie, or of other needfull helps in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their estate, when it was well fetled, and held the best part of Italie, under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was aboundantly provided of all which is need-full to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of emploiment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe fo well fetled. It is eafle to fay, that Alexander had no more, than thirtie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse (a sindeede, at his first passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base esteminate Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Persitaess, Asiatiques, Crasteru, Emmens, Prolomic, Antigenue, and Lyjimuchun, with the actions by them performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power; shall easily sinde, that such a reckoning is stare thou to of the truth.

It were needlelse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batteric, to and the like: of all which, the Macedonan had aboundance; the Roman having nought, saue men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what for the Roman, in their first Punick warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Nauigation; sitting upon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practife the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will eafily conceiue, how farre too weake they would have proved in such ferrices.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not fee, why all Greece and Macedon, being abfolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserve to be laid in ballance. against those parts of Italie, which the Romans held in ill-affured subjection. Toomit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthie, indeede, than 20 valiant, could have affoorded vnto the Macedonian : let vs only conjecture, how the States of Swill and Carthage, nearest neighbours, to such a quarrell (had it happened) would have stood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Gracians, neither is it to bee doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves vnto him. thacruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexanderscomming into those parts, would have brought excessive joy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his fubjects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathoeles, the Tyrant of Syracule, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne belieged Citic, could, by adventuring to faile into Affrick, 30 put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall wee thinke that they would have been able to withfland Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, feeing that they fent Embassadours, with their submission, as farreas Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans mult, without other succour, than perhaps of some few Italian friends ( of which yea there were none, that for fooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of ail Countries, to them knowne, if they would have made relistance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking such a match; it is uncasie to finde in discourse of bumane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is a- 40 gainst cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate: for who foeuer contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemie goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to bee cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him fuspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those daies the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitic, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armir, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all forts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did fend forth. Concerning 50 fortune; who can give a rule that shall alwaies hold? Alexander was victorious in eucry battaile that he fought : and the Romans in the iffue of eucry warre. But forasmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthie of consideration; I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where in three yeares after his death, the two Roman Confulls, together with all the power of that State, were furprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld by their armes. We may therefore permit Lime to admite his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the sume conceipt should blind our judgment, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding fuch a controuerlie, me thinks it were not amiffe, for an Englipmun, to give fuch a fentence betweene the Alacedomans and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) betweene the Ardestes and Aricim, that Link Decades, though about a pecce of land; saying, that it belonged vnto neither of them, but vnto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the belt Warriour? I will answere: The Englishmen. For it will soone appeare, to any that (hall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; againft no fauage or vinnanlie people; the enemic being farre fuperiour vinto vs in numbers, and all needfull proutitions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In what fort Philip wanne his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Perjams and Indians were; whom Alexander vanquilhed; as likewise of what force 20 the Macedonian Phalans, was, and how well appointed, against fuch armes as it commonly encountred: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing storie of them, doth sufficiently vnders that. Yet was this Phalans neuer, or very feldome, abletostand, against the Roman Armies; which were embattailed in so excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation belides them haue vsed, eith refere or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensue and defensue, were of greater vse, than those with which any other Nation bath ferued, before the firric intruments of Gunne-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome_ had to doe; we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom the chald little adjuntagein armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This also (as Platarch well observed have the surface to one of her happinesse; that thee was neuer ouer-laied, with

Hereby it came to paffe, that having at first increased her strength, by accession of the salimes; having wonne the State of Alba, against which shee adventured her owne selfe, as it were in wager, you the heads of three Champions: and having thereby made her selfe Princesse of Latimn: shee did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all state. The Carthaganian had well neare oppressed her: but their Souldiers were Mercinarie; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their owne doores. The Atolians, and with 40 them all, or the most of Greece, affilted her against Polity the Macedonian: hee being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the same Atolians. The warres against sinetimes, and other Assingues, were such as gave to Rome small cause of boast, though much of joy: for those opposites were as base of courage, as the lands which they sheld were aboundant of riches. Stai', Spaine, and all Greece, sell into her hands by valing her aide, to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

If hall not neede to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when she had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Reman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many samous victories: I am not so ide. This I say; that among all their warres, I sinde not any, wherein their so valour hath appeared, comparable to the English. If my judgement seeme ouerpartiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

First therefore it is well knowne; that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neuer any so braue a Commander in warre, as Inlius C.e.far: and that no Roman armie, was comparable vnto that, which served vnder the same C.e.far. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had given faire proofe of the Koman courage, in good performance of the Heluetian warre, when it first entred into Gaule.

was nevertheleffe vtterly disheartened, when Cefar led it against the Germans. So that we may justly impute, all that was extraordinarie in the valour of Cafars men to their long exercise, under so good a Leader, in so great a warre. Now let vs inge-nerall compare with the deedes done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall feruice; the things performed in the fame Countrie, by our common English

Souldier, leavied in hatte, from following the Cart, or fitting on the shop-stall: 60 shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairely, and beloeue Casar, in rela-

Etions were performed by the English. In Cafars time, France was inhabited by the Gaules, a front people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were subdued; cuen when the Romans gaue them affiliance. The Countrie of Gaule was rent in funder (as Cafar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were gouerned by pettic Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in fuch fort as might make it appliable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent : not only in generall through the whole Countrie, but betweene the pettie States, yearn euery Citie, and almost in euery house. What greater aduantage could a Conquerour defire? Yet there was a greater. Arionistus, with his Germans, had ouer-runne flauerie: yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in warre voon the Gaules, that the Gaules ( who had fometimes beene the better Souldiers ) did hold themselves no way equall to those daily Inuaders. Had France beene so prepared vnto our English Kings, Rome it felfe, by this time, and long ere this time, would have beene ours.

But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, hee found the whole Countrie fetled in obedience to one mightic King; a King whose reputation abroade, was no leffe, than his puiffance at home; under whose Ensigne, the King

the Countrie, and held much part of it in a subjection, little different from meere 20

ting the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, whata-

Let vs heare, what a French writer faith, of the inequalitie that was betweene the John de Senes. I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their the presuge (qui Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armie nonent unecon-10 of eight thousand, which he had furrounded with fortie thousand, better appoin- dismostate anx ted, and no leffe expert warriours. All that have salve there there is the save for those cowardly Kings Perseus and Gentius, are worthic patternes. read of Cresse and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not alleage the bat- since la meiltaile of Pointers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proofe and etailism whereof hath left many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than ener did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Croffe-bow: my answere is readie; that in all these respects, it is also (being and drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vie. The Gunne, and the Croffe-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakenesse, or sicknesse, or a fore finger, makes the long Bow vnferuiceable. More particularly, I fay, that it was the cultome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blanck and so shall hee perceiue, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most, can be deliuered, before they close. Nei-therisit in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect, of an extraordinarie 20 arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wanne so many great battailes, having no aduantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestic, referre him to the French Hiltorian: who relating the victorie of our men at Crewant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemie, vieth these words; The English comes with a tole de Seres. conquering brauerie, as he, that was accustomed to gaine enery where, without any stay : bee forceth our garde, placed woon the bridge, to keepe the paffage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where hee tells, how the Britons, being inuaded by Charles the eight, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparell a thousand and two hundred of their owne men in English Cassacks; hoping that the very fight of 40 the English red Croffe, would be enough to terrific the French. But I will not franch to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus &mylius; report wonders of our Nation) the proposition which first I vndertooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the English, preuailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of Romans, which was affisted with all advantages that could be defired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cafar had done? my answere may bee (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Lacida, of whom the old Poet Ennius gaue this note; Belli potentes funt mage quam fapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde, that none of them went to 50 workelike a Conquerour: faue only King Henrie the fift, the course of whose victories, it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be first made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaule, before the time of Cafar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good lei-Ddddd

Cafar himfelfe doth witnesse, that the Gaules complained of their owne ignorance in the Art of warre, and that their owne hardineffe was ouer-maftered, by the skill of their enemies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raifed and planted against their walls, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that fuch a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the skie, are commonly put to the worfe, 49 by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppose their affailants: as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to paffe, that they were neuer able to make vie of oportunitie; but sometimes compelled to flay for their fellowes; and fometimes driven, to give or take battaile, vpon extreme disaduantages, for feare, least their Companies should full a-funder: asindeede, vpon any little difaster, they were readie to breake, and returne every one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little leffe than all this) great oddes in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the bonour of many galiant victories. What so fuch helpe? or what other worldly help, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of Warre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs?

fure; and then especially had they both leifure, and fit oportunitie, when ye derries conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquilled the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Countrie of Gaule had beene pitcouffy wasted. Surely, the words of Tullie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion; with the Gaules. for prescruation of their owne safetie.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaule, until they were Lords of all other Countries, to them knowne. We on the other fide, held only the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (vileffe perhaps in wealth and numbers of men fomewhat inferiour) euery way equall to our felues; a Nation, anciently & strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, 10 enemie to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs : and the greater danger at our backs; where comonly we felt, alwaies we feared, a stronger inuation by land, than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces over Sca.

It is viuall, with men, that have pleased themselves, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great injurie done to their judgment if any take vpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I am well perswaded, that as the divided vertue of this our lland, hath given more noble proofe of it selfe; than under so worthie a Leader, that Roman Armie could doc, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cefar a Monarch; fo hereafter, by Gods bleffing, who hath converted our greatest hindrance, into our 20 greatest helpe, the enemie that shall dare to trie our forces, will finde canfe to wish, that avoiding vs, hee had rather encountred as great a puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying a fide comparisons, we returne to the rehearfall of deeds done; wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to ftriue with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Panick warre.

Q. II. The eflate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

He Citie of Carthage had flood aboue fixe hundred yeares, when first 30 it beganne to contend with Rome, for the mastric of Sical. It forewent Rome one hundred and fiftie yeares in antiquitie of foundation; but in the honor of great atchieuements, it excelled farre beyond this aduantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa

it felfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and fine hundred miles in length, wherein flood three hundred Cities. It had jubjected all Spaine, euch to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all the Handsin the Medicerran Sea, to the west of Sicil; and of Sicil the better part. It flourished about feuen hundred and thirtie yeare, before the destruction therof by Serpio: who belides other spoiles, and all that the Souldiers referred, carried thence foure hun-40 dred & feuentie thousand weight of filter, which make of our monie (if our pounds differ not) fourteene hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citic, ranne the fame fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and fince. The ruine of the goodlieft peeces of the world, fore-shewes the diffolution of the whole.

About one hundred yeares after fuch time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt; and by Gracebus it was called Junonio; it was againg and againe abandoned and repeopled, taken and retaken; by Genferious the Vandal, by Belofarius under tuffinian, by the Perfians, by the Leyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The feat thereof was exceeding firong; and, while the Cartha-50 ginians commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Seacompassed it about, fauing that it was tied to the maine by a neck of land; which pallage had two mile and more of breath (Api in faith three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to beleeue the common report, that the Citie it felfe, was about twentie mile in compasse; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have beene twice as great. It had three walls, without the wall of the Citie; and betweene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults under ground, of thirtie foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food. Ouer these they had stables for foure thousand horse, and Granaries for all their prouender. They had also lodging in these streets, betweene these out-walls for foure thousand horse-men and twentie thousand foot-men, which (according to the discipline vsed now by a lin Pol. drift. 1.2.6.9. those of China) neuer pestered the Citie. It had towards the South part, the Castle day, doe also take the of Byr/a; to which Seruius gives two and twentie furlongs in compaffe, that make one halfe of the poor of Byr/s; to which Serum gives two and twenter through it company, that had be used to the control of many come, that land is used to the many come is the cardiages. the Libyans, when shee got leaue to buy only so much land of them, as shee could they take to but both copalle with an Oxe hide. On the west side it had also the falt Sea, but in the nature of the bodies, and of of a standing poole; for a certaine arme of Land, fastened to the ground, on which has their Vastals, by the Citie flood, stretched it felfe towards the west continent, and left but seventie bereauing them of foot open for the Sea to enter. Ouer this flanding Sea was built a most fumptious their ableft children, whereby they themselves might have the better meanes to occupie all Stell, whilest that Iland should be desticute of Italian succours. Hereupon wee finde good cause, of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twentie cefine pound, lent from thence to Rome, when the Sammites were onerthrowne. But the little frate of Rome, premailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthaged din Sicill. For that mightie Armie, of three hundred thouland men, which Hamibal conducted out of Africk into Sicill, wanne only two Cities therein; many great fleets were denoured by tempelts; and howfocuer the Carthaginians prenailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by affillance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, and take reuenge vpon these Inuadours. But never were the people of Carthage in better hope, of getting all Sicill, than when the death of Agathodes the F yrant, had left the whole I and in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were buffe, in making their advantage, of this good oportunitie; Prirhus, inuited by the Tarentines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where hee made sharpe warre voon the Romans. These newes were unpleating to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtile Nation, casily foresaw, that the same busic disposition, which had brought this cill: which caused them to make such a goodly offer. But the Romans were too high minded: and refused to accept any such aide of their friends, least it should bleaish their reputation, and make them feeme vnable to fland by their owne flrength. 30 Yet the meffage was taken louingly, as it ought; and the former league betweene Rome and Carthage renued, with covenants added, concerning the prefent bulinelle; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be, with refernation of libertie, to affift the other, in case that Pyrrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, vling all meanes to found his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one vpon enery new occasion changeth his owne purpoles) yet Pyrrhus found leifure to make a step into Sicill: where, though in fine he was neither getter nor fauer, yet hee cleane defeated the purpoles of Carthage, leauing them at his departure thence, as farre from any end, as when they first of

So many disasters, in an enterprise, that from the first undertaking, had beene so ftrongly purfued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to believe, that an higher providence relifted their intendment. But their delire, of winning that fruitfull Iland, was fo inneterate; that with vinwearied patience, they ftill continued in hope, of fo much the greater an haruest, by how much their cost and paines therein buried had beene the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practise, recouered in few yeares, all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, that so they might the better enable themselues to deale with 50

Somewhat before this time, a troupe of Campanian Souldiers, that had serued under Agathooles, being entertained within Meljana as friends, and finding themfelues too strong for the Citizens, tooke aduantage of the power that they had to doe wrong; and with perfidious crueltie, flew those that had trusted them; which done they occupied the Citie, Lands, Goods, and Wines, of those, whom they had murdered. These Mercinaries called themselues Munertines. Good Souldiers they were : and like enough it is, that meere desperation, of finding any that would approve their barbarous treacherie, added rage vnto their floutnesse. Having therefore none other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they ouerranne the Countrie round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messens against the Cities of Sicill Confederate; to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but to they rather wan vpon them, yea, and vpon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turning her back to these Mamertines, the Syracufians wanne fast vponthem, and finally, confining them within the walls of Meffens, they also with a powerfull Armie belieged the Citic. It happened iil, that about the fame time, a contention beganne, betweene the Syracular Souldiers, then lying at Megara, and the Citizens of Syracufe, and Gouernours of the Common-wealth; which proceeded so farre that the Armie elected two Gouernours, among themselves; to wit, Artemidorue, and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his yeares excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrarie to the policie of that State, to approve any election made 20 by the Souldiers, yet for the great elemencie hee vied at his first entrance, was by generall consent, established and made Gouernour. This Office, he rather vsed as a Scale, thereby to clime to some higher degree, than rested content with his prefent preferment.

In briefe, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himselfe within the Citie; and somewhat without it, that gaue impediment, to his obtayning, and fafe keeping, of the place he fought; to wit, a powerfull partie within the Towne, and certaine mutinous troups of Souldiers without often and eafily moued to fedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himselfe, hee tooke to wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authoritie among the 20 Stratufians. For the fecond, leading out the Armie to beliege Messana, he quartered all those Companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the Citie, and leading the rest of his horse and foot vnto the other side, as if he would have affaulted it in two feuerall parts, he marched away under the couert of the Towne walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in peeces by the affreged: So returning home, and leauying an Armic of his owne Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hafted againe towards Messana, and was by the Mamertines (growne proud by their former victoricouer the Mutiners) incountred in the plaines of Aylaum, where hee obtained a molt fignall victorie, and leading with him their Commander Captine into Syratule, himselfe by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the 40 Mamer incs, finding themselues vtterly inscebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom, the seuerall factions, dispatched Embassadours for the same purpose.

The Carthaginians were foone readic, to lay hold vpon the good offer: fo that a Captaine of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gaue him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclineable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to fo good agreement, that this Captaine, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of dores, and the Towne referued for other Masters.

These newes did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Cap-50 taine, as both a Traitour and Coward; and fent a Fleet and Armie to beliege Mef-Sana, as a Townethat rebelled, having once been theirs. Hieron, the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people, incensed with the smart of injuries lately receiued) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom hee entred into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were Ddddd 3 closed wp within Message the Carthaginians lying with a Nauic at Sea, and with an Armie on the one side of the Towne, while the steron with his Syracusians, lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger, came Appine Claudine, the Roman Confull, with an Armieto the fireights of Suil: which paffing by night with notable audacitie, hee put himselfe into the Towne, and sending Mediengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hire, required them to depart; signifying wno them, that the Admertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore hee was come to give them protection, cuen by force of warre, if reason would not prevaile.

This message was vetterly neglected; And so beganne the warre betweene Rome 10 and Carthage; wherein, it will then be time to shew, on which part was the justice of the quarrell, when some actions of the Romans, lately foregoing this, have beene first considered.

ò. III.

The beginning of the first Punick warre. That it was vniuslly undertaken by the Romans.

Hen Pyrrhus beganne his warres in Italie, the Citic of Rhegium, being well affected to Roma, and not only fearing to Letaken by the Epirat, but much more distrussing the Carthaginians, as likely to seize upon it in that busiletime, sought aide from the Romans, and obtained sion them a Legion, consisting of source thousand Sculdiers, under the conduct of Decisis Campanis, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and afflired for the prefent. But after a while, this Roman Garrifon, confidering at good leifure, the fact of the Mamerines, committed in Maffian, (a Citic in Sciel, Ituate almost opposite to Rhegium, and no otherwise divided than by a narrow Sea, which sewerth it from Italie) and rather weighing the greatness of the bootie, than the 30 odious field of the vilanie, by which it was gotten; refolued simily, to make the like purchase, by taking the like wicked course. Consederating therefore themselves with the Mamerines, they entertained their Holts of Rhegium, after the same manner; dividing the spoile, and all which that State had, among themselves.

When complaint was made to the Senate & people of Reme, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly flained (for no Nation in the world made a more fluere profession of justice, than they did, during all the time of their growing greatness; procluded, after a while, to take reuenge upon the offenders. And this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in this they performed shortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in the state, by Pyrthus. For, not with slanding that those Remains it Pegumu (as men for 40 the folleness of the first shortly and those which established the first shortly and those which established the present since, were brought bound to Reme, where after the visual torments by whipping inflicted, according to the custome of the Countrie, they had their heads stricken from their shoulders; and the people of Rhegium were againe restored to their former liberties and cstates.

This execution of justice being newly performed, and the famethereof founding honourably through all quarters of Italie: meficages came to Rome, from Ateffina, defiring helpe againft the Carthaginians, and Syraufans, that were in a readineffe to inflict the like puniflment vpon the Momertines, for the like offence, so An impudent requestit was, which they made: who bauing both given example of that vilanie, to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with joynt forces to make it good; intreat the Judges to give them that affishance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow theeves.

The Romanicould not fuddenly refolue, whether the way of honeftic, or of profit, were to be followed; they cuernore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They confidered, how contraine the courfe of fuccouring the Mamerimes was, to their former counfells, and actions: feeing for the fame oftences they had lately put to torment, and to the fword, their owne Souldiers, and reflored the opprefiled to their libertie. Yet when they beheld the defeription of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were alreadic Lords of the beft parts of Africa, of the Mediterran llands, of a great part of Spaine, and fome part of Smith Cite, whileft also they feared, that Syrache therein feated (a Citie in beautic and riches, to little, at that time, inferiour to Carthage, and faire superiour to Eame it Cite) might become theirs; the fafetic of their owne cliate pake for thele Manetines: who, if they (driuen to de spaire by the Romans should deliuer vp Messiman, with those other holds, that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginina, then would nothing stand betweene Carthage, and the Lordship of all Sied: for Syracuse it selle could not, for want of succour, any long time substit, if once the Carthaginens, that were Matters of the Sea, dat daften you that passing from the maine Land. It was surther considered; that the oportunitie of McSanawas such, as would not only debarre, all succours out of the continent, from arrival in Stati, but would retue as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginam might have entrance into state, at their owne pleasure.

These confiderations, of profit at hand, and of preuenting dangers, that threatned from a farre; did so preuaile, about all regard of honestie, that the Autocrimes were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Chandier the Confull, presently dispatcht away for Oxtefpase, into which he entred, and vades tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arrisall; and less moued, with his requiring them, to defist from their attempt. For they disfarre exceede him in number of men; the whole Iland was readie to relicethem in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Ap, int himselfe well wndershood: and against all this, he thought the shifte metall of his Roman Souldier, a fusicient remeto die. Therefore, he resolved to issue out not the field, and to let the enemies know.

c) die. I nervise, he refolued to flue out into the ne'd, and to let the enemies know, that his comming was to fend them away from the Towne; not to be befreged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemial ayencamped in fuch fort, as one quarter was not well able to relicuenother in difficulte. Here wers now exposed to the same danger, whereinto hee had wisfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helps of others. Against him Ap. Claudius is flued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected fallie, to furprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith hee prefented him.

40 The 39 rate of an wanted not courage to fight; but firely, hee wanted good addince: elfewould he not haue hazarded all his power againft an enemic, of whom he had made no triall; when it had beene eafle, and as much as was requifite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorne the beiginning of his raigne. But he was well beaten, and driuen to faue bracklife within his Trenches; by which loffe, he learned a point of viriclome, that nood him and his Kingdome in good flead, all the dates of his life. It was a foolith defire of runge, that had made the Syracufians fo buffe, in helping those of Carchage, ag unfit the Admertines.

Had Moffans beene taken by the Carthaginians, Syraufe it felfs much have fought to help from Rome, againft those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Haven had (intespect of those two mightic Cities) but a small stock, which it believed him to governe well: such another losse would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Camp, and retired home: intending to let them shand to their adventures, that had hope to bee gainers by the bargaine. The next day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritic of his fouldiers, give charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherin he fped fo well, that the enemic for looke both field and campe, leaving all the Countriespen to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without retillance, intended to lay fiege vnto the great Citie of Syracufe.

These prosperous beginnings, how socuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attayning to greater matters, than at first they had expected. Yet did they not imprint any forme of terronr, in the Citie of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater loffes than this; in which no more was loft, than what had beene prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspition of warre to

Now in this place I hold it feafonable, to confider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honellie (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict termes of lawfulnesse, whereupon they built ail their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, diffressed by the Samnies, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the meisengers of those folke, wherof one part had alreadic admitted the Carthagmians, could be enabled to make any fuch furrendrie, in the publike name of all 20

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull furrendrie of themselues and their possethens, were become subject vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans allift the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it bee supposed. that fome point feruing to cleare this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesseitis, that no companie, of Pirates, Theeues, Out-lawes, Murderers, or fuch other malefactours, can by any good fuccesse of their vilanie, obtaine the privilege of civill societies, to make league or truce, yea, or to require faire warre; but are by all meanes, 20 as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith, with one of thefe; it were a Polition of ill confequence : This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can give protection to fuch as the fe, as long as any other is ving the fword of vengeance against them, without becomming accessarie to their crimes. Wherefore, we may effected this action of the Romans, To farre from being justifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this neft of Murderers and Theeues, into their protection, they justly deserved to be warred upon themselves, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Mef-(and had beene taken, and the Mamertines all flaine, ere any newes of this Confede- 40 racie had beene brought vnto the befiegers. The great Alexander was fo farre perfwaded herein; that he did put to fword all the Branchiada (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their Citie, notwithstanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; because they were descended from a Companie of Milestans, who to gratifie King Norwes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towns and Countrie, which these of their posteritic enjoyed. Neuerthelesse, in course of humane justice, long and peaceable possession gives ins acquisitum, a kinde of right by prescription, vnto that which was at first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the descendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose vilanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Theeues, which by a dete- to stable tast bath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For even the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by fome alliance with the ancient inheritors, bee can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Mande, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironfide. Wheretore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had fo good) of juflice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her felfe, in the time of her visitation; was burnt to ground.

Of the Iland of Sicil,

The qualitie of the Iland : and the first Inhabitants thereof.

He defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, fince the first victories of Appius Clandius, the objects of no longer, fince the first victories of Appius Claudius, the Objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will be agreeable ynto the order, which in the like cases we have observed, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Iland, which hath beene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present Warre.

That Sicil was fometimes a Peninfula, or Pemie-Isle, adjoyned to Italie, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neare vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempelt fe-30 uered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this division happened, there is no memoriall remayning, in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plinie, and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Si- Plin. 12.c. 11. lin, and Cafindorus, doe thinke it to have beene done by the rage and violence of Sillis. the tide, and furges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Eubaaseucred from Baotia; Atalante and Macris, from Eubaa; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornewall; and Britaine it felfe (as may feeme by Verflegans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their eares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three forked Mace, in fauour of locastus, the sonne of Aolus, divided it 40 from the maine land, and so made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie-Isie; that by that meanes, hee might the more fafely inhabite, and possesse the fame.

Diederus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hefiedus, ascribeth the labour of fun- grion. 14. c.14. dring it from Italie, to Orion : who, that he might be compared to Hersules (cutting Diod.1.6. through the rocks and mountaines) first opened the Sicilian fireights, as Herosles did Ound de Fast. 4.

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not only to excell the reft for bigneffe, but also for goodnesse of soile. As concerning the forme of this Iland, Pomponius Mela, faith, it is like that Capitall letter of 50 the Greeks, which they call Delta, namely, that it bath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowneto be true. That the whole Iland was confecrated to Ceres and Proferpina, all old writers with one confent affirme. To Cresit was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corne : to Proscripta, not so much, for that thee was from hence violently taken by Plato, as because (which Platarch and Diodorus doe report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as shee, vncouering her selse, first shewed her selse to be seene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonic written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he faith, that Alareus Caso did call it the Granarie, and Storehouse of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulvar fors. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not only the store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was accounted for a well furnished treasurie. For without any cost or charge of ours (faith he) it hath vsually cloathed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparrell, and corne. Strate reporteth almost the same thing of it. What societ Stelle doth yeeld (saith Solinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industric and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation : were it not, that fuch things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extreamely ouer-growne with faffron. Diodorus Steelus faith, that in the fields, neare vinto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it selfe, without any labour, or looking to, of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it fixe Colonies, and fixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are Now besides many samous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre; there be many other things, which have made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the rauilhing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Aina, Scylla and Charibdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; belides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes; the famous Geometrician Euclides; the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lestriogones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe joyntly with one consent auerre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt only in one part of the Hand. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessited it. That these Sicani were not bred in the Isle (although some doe so thinke,) Thucydides and Diodorses doe constantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were inuaded by the Sicali; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelafgi from their owne feates, and finding no place vpon the continent, which they were able to master and inhabite, passed ouer into this Iland, three hundred yeares before the Greekes fent any Colonies thither : and (faith Philiffus) eightic yeares before the fall of Troy. These Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the lland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the East and Northerne part thereof, into the West and South. At their landing, they first built the Citie Zande, afterward called Mellena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syraculeit felfe, beating from thence the Etolians, who long before had fet vp a Towne in that place. 40 As for the name of Syracuse, it was not knowne, till such time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the lland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their first arrivall dispossesse the Atolians thereof, but some hundred yeares after their descent, and after such time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Nee, Hybla, Trinacia, and diversothers.

After these Siculi came another Nation out of Italie, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. These sate downe in that part of Sierl, where they afterward raifed the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a civill warre greatly infeebled. Among these ancient ftories, we finde the last voiage, and the death of Mines, King of Creet. Thueydides, 50 an Historian of vnquestionable sinceritie, reports of Minos, that he made conquest of many Ilands: and some such businesse, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is that he came thither in pursuit of Dadalus. The tale goes thus: Dedalus fleeing the revenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and during his aboade there, he built a place of great itrength, neare vnto Alegara, for Cocaius, to lay vp his treasure in ; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the rest, he cast a Ramine in gold, that was set up in the Temple of Vemus Eryema; which he did with fo great arte, as those that beheld it, thought it rather to be living, than counterfait. Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Padalus, prepares to inuade the Territorie of Cocalus, but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his owne Ilrength, promifeth to deliuer D.edalsa. This he performes not, but in the meane while, kills Minos by treason, and perswades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sial; the better (as it feemes) to strengthen himselfe against the Siant. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their confent, and builded for themselves the Citic of Minon, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewise built the Towne of Engum, now called Gange: and these were the first Cities, built by the Greeks in Sieil, about two ages before their arre of Trey; for the grand-children of Atmos ferued with the Greeks at the fleges, ereof.

But after such time as the Cretans understood, that their King had by treason beene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to inuade Cocalus: and landing neare voto Camicus, they belieged the fame five yeares but in vaine. In the an end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coaft of stalie; and having no meanes to repaire their ships, nor the honor they had loft, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betweene the two famous Ports of Brundujum, and Tarentum. Of these Cretans came those Nations, afterward called lapyges, and Messapij.

After the taking of Troj, Egeltus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troups into Sicil, and feated themselves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Ægesta and Elyma.

It is faid, that Aneas visited these places in his passage into Italie: and that some of the Troinnes, his followers, were left behinde him, in these Townes of Sieil: 20 whereof there want not good Authours, that make . Ene.is him felfe the founder.

About the fame time, the Phanicians feifed vponthe Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybeum, and upon certaine small Isles adjoyning to the maine Iland: which they fortified, to fecure the trades, that they had with the Sicilians; like as the Porturals have done in the East India, at Goa, Ormus, Mosambia, and other places. But the Phanicians staired not there; for after they had once assured their descents, they built the goodly Citic of Panormus, now called Palerma.

These we finde, were the Nations, that inhabited the Isle of Siel, before the warre of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to ftraggle in those parts.

It may perchance feeme strange to the Reader, that in all ancient storie, he findes 40 one and the fame beginning of Nations, after the floud; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were faid to bee mightie and Giantlike men; and that, as Phanicia, Lapt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Orestes, Anteus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmarke had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticu; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Saxo G. in pre-Sicil had her Leftrigones and Cyclopes. This discourse I could also reject for fained fai bift. and fabulous; did not Mofes make vs know, that the Zamzummim:, Eminis, Anakims, and og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Defarts of Moib, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding firength and fla-Totall, de Reture, and of the races of Giants : and were it not, that Tertullian, St. Augustine, Ni- fire.

cornes and roots, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies, with the skins of beafts, their hunting, their armes, and weapons, and their warfare, their first pasfages over great Rivers, and armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leather, then of wood; first, with Oares, and then with faile; that they esteemed as Gods, the first finders out of Arts. as of Hulbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the same newnesse of time, which we call old time, and had all the fame want of his instruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were removed farre off from the Hebrewes, who inherited the knowledge to of the first Patriarchs, than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the causes: from whence came Philosophie Naturall; as the Morall did from disorder and confusion; and the Law from crucitie and oppression.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth stranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For we have now greater Giants, for vice and injustice, than the World had in those daies, for bodily strength; for cottages and houses of clay and timber, we have raised Palaces of stone; we carne them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; infomuch as men are rather knowne by their houses, than their houses by them; we are fallen from two dishes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkennesse; from the couering of our bodies with the 20 skinnes of beafts, not only to filke and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digression, Time will also take reuenge of the excesse, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longior ý, auxit, longisima subruit; Long time brought forth, longer time increased it, and a time, longer than the rest shall overthrow it.
